Judicial Precedent—Privy Council decision—How far binding—Argument not presented to Board.

Application for the registration of the trade mark "Pabalate" in respect of pharmaceutical substances was made by an American company on January 24, 1952. That application was opposed by an English company, and on November 26, 1952, the application was withdrawn. On December 9, 1952, the English company applied for registration of the mark "Pabalate" in respect of pharmaceutical substances, and their application was opposed by the American one, who contended that registration should not be allowed on the ground that it would be contrary to section 11 of the Trade Marks Act, 1938, having regard to their wide user of the mark in the United States and Canada and the extensive advertising in medical journals and trade papers in connexion with that use, one of which had reached this country. They had registered the mark in Canada. The registrar allowed the application and the opponents appealed to the court. At the hearing of the appeal the further question was argued whether the registration would be disentitled to protection in a court of justice under section 11, because it would offend section 2 of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, under which a person is penalized who "forges any trade "mark . . . unless he proves that he acted without intent to "defraud":—

(2) That the words "makes that trade mark" in section 4 (a) of the Act of 1887 imported into the Act an association of a mark with a course of trade in goods; and that, accordingly, to establish that a trade mark has been forged within section 2 (a), it must be established that it has been associated on or in relation to goods in respect of which the mark has been associated in relation to trade as a trade mark.

(3) That the definition of "trade mark" in section 3 (1) of the Act of 1887 does not include a mark where a foreign user of it fails to avail himself of the priority provisions of section 91 of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907; the mark is not then "protected "by law in any . . . foreign state" within the meaning of the definition, even though it is registered in one. Accordingly, the objection to registration by the English company based on the Act of 1887 failed.

(4) That in the discretion of the court registration should be refused, and the appeal should be allowed.

MOTION.

By an application dated January 24, 1952, A. H. Robins Company Inc., a firm of manufacturing chemists incorporated in and carrying on business in the United States of America, applied for the registration of the mark "Pabalate" (standing alone) in respect of pharmaceutical substances. That application was opposed by Vitamins Ld., the registered proprietors of the trade mark "Pabavel." On November 26, 1952, that application was withdrawn.

On December 9, 1952, Vitamins Ld. (hereafter called the applicants) applied to register the word "Pabalate" as a trade mark in respect of pharmaceutical substances. That application was opposed by A. H. Robins Company Inc. (hereafter referred to as the opponents). The grounds of that opposition were that the opponents had registered the word "Pabalate" as their trade mark in relation to certain pharmaceutical substances in the United States and Canada, and that their user had been widely advertised in medical journals or trade papers published in the United States and Canada, which had circulated in the United Kingdom, and that registration of the word "Pabalate" by the applicants would therefore be contrary to section 11 of the Trade Marks Act, 1938.[1] By his decision dated May 31, 1954, the assistant-comptroller (acting for the registrar, the comptroller-general) allowed the application to proceed to registration. The opponents appealed from that decision.

At the hearing of the appeal the further question was argued as to whether the registration of this mark by the applicants would be disentitled to protection in a court of justice under

[1] Trade Marks Act, 1938, s. 11: "It shall not be lawful to register as "a trade mark or part of a trade "mark any matter the use of which "would, by reason of its being likely "to deceive or cause confusion or "otherwise, be disentitled to protec-"tion in a court of justice. . . ."

section 11 of the Act of 1938 because it would offend section 2 of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887.[2]

LLOYD-JACOB J., having stated the issues, continued: In addition to the main ground of opposition under section 11 of the Trade Marks Act, 1938, counsel for the opponents urged that the mark "Pabalate" would not justify registration according to section 9 of the Act. It is unnecessary to consider those submissions in detail, as I am satisfied that there was no foundation whatever for any objection to this application based on section 9.

Before the assistant-comptroller the opponents relied on their proprietary rights in this mark by reason of their use of the mark in the United States of America in connexion with a specific said to be of value in the treatment of arthritic complaints, and of the advertisements in relation to that business which they contended had reached this country; and, in addition, of any flowing from the application they had made in this country for registration of the same mark in respect of a pharmaceutical preparation.

The evidence filed on behalf of the opponents was found, on examination, merely to justify the finding of fact in the decision that one copy only of a periodical primarily circulating in the United States of America had, before the date of the present application, reached this country and was filed at the offices of the British Medical Association in Tavistock Square in London, and had thus been available for members of that association since September 26, 1951.

In the light of that evidence the assistant-comptroller held that the opponents had failed to establish such a reputation in the United Kingdom in respect of the mark "Pabalate" as would justify a conclusion that confusion or deception would occur on that account should registration be permitted. I am unable to find any ground on which I can come to the conclusion that that finding was incorrect, and I have no alternative, accordingly, but to adopt it.

In addition to the objection under section 11 to which the decision of the assistant-comptroller was directed, namely, whether or not the use of the mark by the applicants would be likely to deceive or cause confusion, it was further submitted that the use of the mark by them would otherwise be disentitled to protection in a court of justice having regard to section 2 of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887. It was mainly in respect of that submission that I felt that the assistance of the comptroller was desirable.

The point can be shortly stated as follows: By section 2 of the Act of 1887 it is provided that every person who forges a trade mark shall, subject to the provisions of the Act and unless he proves that he acted without intent to defraud, be guilty of an offence, which is in the nature of a criminal offence, this being a penal statute.

An initial matter which calls for determination is with regard to the possible defence under this section embraced by the words "unless he proves that he acted without intent to defraud." It has been laid down in a long line of decisions that the intention to defraud referred to in section 2 must be found in the deliberate commission of the act which comprises the forging of the trade mark. If any support for that proposition be required, it will be found in the recent decision of Lord Goddard C.J. in Slatcher v. Mence Smith (George) Ld.[1] In the passage of the judgment which summarizes the conclusion of the court Lord Goddard, after reciting a number of previous authorities in which the same principle had been expressed, stated[2]: "In this state of the "authorities it seems to us that we must construe the words "'that otherwise he had acted innocently'"—for this purpose those words can be considered as equivalent to the words "without intent to deceive"—"as meaning that he had acted "inadvertently or under some mistake of fact. The fact that "he had acted in good faith and had taken all precautions against "committing an offence against the Act will not amount to proof "that the defendant had otherwise acted innocently."

It has been submitted that in the particular circumstances of the prosecutions under this Act which arise in connexion with trade marks of a foreign origin, some additional scope will be found for the phrase "without intent to defraud" so as to protect the person who, although in good faith, deliberately applies to his goods a mark which is in fact the property of a foreign owner, so that such a person can avoid conviction under this Act on the ground that the absence of any reputation in this country by the foreign owner effectively prevents any conceivable fraud on the public. In my judgment the true construction of the expression in section 2 of the Act cannot depend on the particular facts of the case under consideration. I can find no justification for supposing that the meaning attached to this phrase in the long course of authorities to which I have referred can now be accepted as erroneous. I would adopt the decisions of the various Divisional Courts that have considered this matter as my own.

It therefore becomes necessary to consider what is comprised within the phrase "forges any trade mark." [His Lordship read section 4 (a) and (b) and continued:] I need not trouble with the alternative in paragraph (b); I have only to consider the consequences of the first in paragraph (a).

The construction of that section presents some difficulty by the use of the phrase "makes that trade mark." That necessarily conveys to the mind more than a delineation of the word or device which comprises the mark. The words "the trade "mark" import into the Act an association of the word or device with a course of trade in goods so as to constitute that which is done, an act relating to goods in the course of trade. It would be most extravagant to suppose that the legislature were constituting an offence if a person used, for example, a word on and in relation to one type of goods merely because there was an existing trade mark consisting of the same word but used in relation to totally different goods, in respect of which the person using it was in no sense in competition. Accordingly, for the purpose of establishing that a trade mark has been forged, I think that it is necessary that the prosecution should, first of all, establish that no assent by the proprietor has been forthcoming and, secondly, that the act committed has been the association of the mark in question by the accused on or in relation to goods in respect of which the word or device has been associated in relation to trade as a trade mark.

There only remains to be considered what is the scope of the expression "trade mark." Although the Act contains in section 3 a definition clause, I am saying nothing original in drawing attention to the fact that the definition of the expression "trade "mark" is far from clear and indeed introduces a very considerable measure of difficulty. Substantially similar words were, it is to be observed, to be found in a Newfoundland statute which fell for the consideration of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in 1918 in Imperial Tobacco Company (Newfoundland) Ld. v. Duffy,[3] where Lord Wrenbury delivered the opinion of the Board, which consisted of Lord Parker and Lord Sumner in addition to Lord Wrenbury.

The particular trade mark statute then under consideration was chapter 112 of the Newfoundland Statutes, section 2 of

VITAMINS LTD.'S APPLICATION, In re.

Lloyd-Jacob J

which contained a definition of trade mark in words which are identical with the definition in section 3 of the Merchandise Marks Act. Their Lordships expressed the view that the Newfoundland statute was undoubtedly ill expressed, but they gave some guidance on the construction of certain portions of the definition. Before I consider that, it is perhaps desirable that I should say that in the result the Board stated that a person successfully securing registration under the Newfoundland statute could no longer be said, when he applied it to goods, to forge that trade mark, nor could it be said that he was falsely applying to goods any trade mark so as to be calculated to deceive.

Although a decision of the Privy Council is not binding on me, I would none the less, for the reasons advanced in the judgment, arrive at precisely the same conclusion; which in the present case, if this application should be successful, would provide a complete answer to proceedings under the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887.

The Board, having considered that definition, indicated certain aspects of its construction and arrived at this conclusion[4]: "It "results that, for the present purpose, section 2 of chapter 112 "may be read as providing that the expression 'trade mark' in "chapter 112 includes any trade mark which, either with or "without registration, is protected by law in America."

I have carefully read the report and the arguments of counsel, and it clearly emerges that the Board were not presented with certain of the arguments which have been put before me.

The definition clause in the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, is in these terms: [His Lordship read section 3 (1) of the Act of 1887 and continued:] It is unnecessary for me to refer in detail to section 103 of that Act or indeed to the comparable provision in section 91 of the Patents Act, 1907, which, by amendment of the law, now obtains; suffice it to say that that is the statutory provision which provides for reciprocity as between the Convention countries so as to secure certain priority in this country for applicants for trade marks in a Convention country.

It is perhaps unnecessary to point out all the difficulties presented by the language of that definition section, but it is essential that I should note that in form it, first of all, defines trade mark by reference to a register in this country and continues "and includes," which prima facie was intended to indicate that the Register of Trade Marks would be a complete form of reference for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not a trade mark within the meaning of the Merchandise Marks Act was in existence. When the definition relates to marks which are protected abroad, whether in a British possession or a foreign State, it is to be observed that it is deliberately expressed to cover marks which secure their protection either with or without registration. If that expression be accepted at its face value, it would indicate that the marks within the definition, so far as they originated abroad, were as to part in a different category from those within the definition which originated in this country. It would appear prima facie to be most unreasonable that in the creation of a criminal offence the marks in relation to which it could be committed were to be of a strictly limited character so far as nationals of this country were concerned and of a much wider category so far as foreigners were concerned, and more particularly when the statutory provisions in respect of registration in this country are of substantial importance.

The reference to " either with or without registration " is, in my judgment, intended to indicate the manner in which protection by law in the country of origin is required in order to enable a trade mark of foreign origin to fall within this definition. It is intended to cover the cases where protection of a trade mark under foreign law is secured either under a domestic system requiring registration or under one which does not require registration.

That leaves to be considered the scope of the phrase " protected by law." As Mr. Stuart Bevan, for the comptroller, pointed out, if the ordinary meaning is given to that expression, it must plainly include any brand name which, according to the domestic law of the country of origin, is maintained as a proprietary right in the person who has created or adopted it, and applied it in the course of trade, and that that would be so whether the business with which it is concerned is limited to a particular foreign territory or whether it has extended into the sphere of international trade. He has found no difficulty in illustrating how these words, given their widest signification, might bring within the purview of the Merchandise Marks Act a mark which has been used in a small territory of no international trading significance in circumstances such that it is not only unlikely but practically impossible that any knowledge of the user could have reached this country. He argued that that is the fair and reasonable interpretation of the definition section, and that any extravagant results which might flow from its application in practice might conceivably be guarded against by an interpretation of section 2 other than that which I have to put on it.

It is clear that a statute must be interpreted according to the ordinary meaning of the words used therein, subject of course to any words or phrases of technical import being given their true technical meaning. That applies where the language does not permit any other meaning to be adopted. If on one reading a construction would involve absurdity or inconsistency, the court is bound to consider the possibility of an alternative construction equally consistent with the technical meaning of the words which will avoid such absurdity or inconsistency.

It seems to me that there is an alternative construction of this definition, namely, that the phrase " protected by law " is directed to that which will permit a trade mark originating in any British possession or foreign State to become included in those registered in the register of trade marks. The reference to section 103 of the Patents, Designs and Trade Marks Act, 1883, is a reference to a specific statutory provision conferring priority in respect of British applications on persons who have made application for protection in their own country. In my reading of this definition, the protection by law there referred to is the protection which is afforded in foreign countries to applicants for priority rights in respect of trade marks, whether secured by application for registration or not, for the purpose and to the extent that that is required to make the right effective in this country. Some possibility of difficulty is left in the way of British nationals in that, to the marks entered on the register to which there is direct reference, there is notionally added for a period of six months from the date of the foreign application the possibility of inclusion of the foreign trade mark with a priority date antecedent to that of the actual application in this country; but since the definition plainly conveys the intention of the legislature to secure such protection for overseas proprietors of trade marks, that is a difficulty which it was bound to envisage.

VITAMINS LD.'S APPLICATION, In re.

In my judgment the definition of " trade mark " in section 3 of this Act extends initially to trade marks entered on the register, and notionally adds to them trade marks which according to the priority given to them by section 103 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act, 1883, can be entered upon the register in consequence. If, therefore, a foreign applicant fails to avail himself of those priority provisions by allowing the period to elapse from the date of his acquisition of a right in his own country, then his mark is not within the expression " trade mark . . . protected by law " in this definition. In the present case, therefore, although there is evidence that the opponents' mark is in fact registered, inter alia, in the Dominion of Canada, there is no material before me which enables me to come to the conclusion that at the date of the present application the priority period of six months in which the opponents could apply under the Convention provisions had not expired, and accordingly, on the construction which I feel bound to give to section 3 of the Merchandise Marks Act, there is no justification for the submission that by reason of the opponents' registration abroad the applicants' use of this mark would be disentitled to protection in a court of justice.

Accordingly, I must hold that the objection to registration based on the Merchandise Marks Act has no substance and cannot prevail.

In his decision the assistant-comptroller indicated that there appeared to be no ground in the case for the exercise of his discretion adversely to the applicants, and indeed it appears that nothing was brought to his attention which would require him to exercise his discretion. It was urged before me on behalf of the applicants that the true inference from that passage in the decision is that the assistant-comptroller had exercised his discretion in their favour. I cannot so read it. It is a fair and clear indication that in the circumstances, so far as they appeared to him, there was no reason in the present case which required him to exercise his discretion adversely to the applicants.

When the matter was further developed before me, two points emerged which call for consideration. The discretion vested in the registrar is, by section 52 of the Trade Marks Act, 1938, vested in the court and the court is directed to exercise the same discretionary powers as are conferred on the registrar in relation to hearings before him.

There are two matters which I have felt it right to consider on this aspect of the case. The first is the propriety or otherwise of the action of the applicants in making this application for registration. By the rules, which have the force of statute, it is provided that applications of this character shall be made upon Form T.M. No. 2, which requires that an application for registration should assert, in the case of a mark which has not yet been used in the trade, that the applicant proposes to use the mark and that he claims to be the proprietor of the mark.

The circumstances of the present case are these, that apart from some early application by some third party, about which little information is available, the present opponents themselves applied on January 24, 1952, for registration of precisely the same word as in this application in Class 5, in respect of pharmaceutical goods. As a result of the investigation of that application in the trade marks registry, they were directed to communicate with the present applicants, who were entered upon the register as the proprietors of a trade mark "Pabavel." On receiving the communication, the applicants refused to consent to the application proceeding and on November 26, 1952, that application was withdrawn and within about a fortnight of that period, on December 9, 1952, the present application was made.

A communication which the applicants had received from the opponents after the withdrawal of their application is set out in the comptroller's decision; that communication contained a quotation of this extract from a letter from certain associate agents in the United States of America: "In view of "the controversy over our 'Pabalate' mark in Great Britain "and the distinct possibility that we may never go into England "with 'Pabalate,' we believe it would be best and avoid further "expense to withdraw from the proceedings."

That was construed by the applicants as an indication that the American corporation were relinquishing all claims to the mark in this country. The communication may have been a little ambiguous, but I am not satisfied that it could fairly be construed as indicating an intention to surrender all rights in the mark. Indeed, the letter expresses a proprietary right by using the phrase "our Pabalate mark." Although I accept that the respondents understood the letter as a surrender of any proprietary rights, I am not satisfied that it was in fact communicating an abandonment. The expression in the application form that the applicant claims to be the proprietor, indicates an assertion of a present proprietary right. The applicants argue that it is merely only an assertion of the claim to become the proprietor or to assume proprietary rights as and when the application is granted, but I do not think that that can be the true interpretation of a form intended to be completed before application can be made for registration. A proprietary right in a mark sought to be registered can be obtained in a number of ways. The mark can be originated by a person or can be acquired, but it is necessary that the person putting forward the application should be in possession of some proprietary right which, if questioned, can be substantiated. Where, as here, another party in respect of precisely the same field of activity in commerce or industry had already put forward, by an application to the trade marks registry, a claim to be the proprietor of the identical trade mark and had withdrawn the application because of a desire to avoid controversy over their mark, it would be a straining of language to suggest that the party who had by opposition secured that result had, as the result of the withdrawal, acquired proprietary rights.

VITAMINS LD.'S APPLICATION, In re.

The position appears to have been this: the applicants by their possession and user of the mark "Pabavel" thought —which they may well have been entitled to do—that the reputation acquired for it was such that the use of the mark "Pabalate" by any other body would be an infringement of their rights, and that, as the result of the development of their business, they desired to introduce other marks into commerce beginning with the same first two syllables, so that they decided to make this application. No explanation has been given, and none has been asked for by anybody, why in the selection of other "Paba" marks they particularly condescended on the one which the opponents had claimed to be their property.

The mere fact that the evidence available may not have been sufficient to establish the right of that party to be entered upon the register does not of itself negative the proprietary right which he had asserted in his application, nor was that right denied by the withdrawal of the application. In my judgment something more must be established than a mere desire to secure registration of a mark which it is thought will be of advantage in one's business. Accordingly I must consider whether or not, in the exercise of my discretion, the applicants claiming to be the proprietors of this mark were in fact making a proper representation to the trade marks registry.

There is a second factor which I should have in mind when exercising a discretionary jurisdiction; and that is that the evidence discloses that the mark has been used by the opponents on and in relation to a remedy or an alleged remedy for arthritic conditions in human beings. The fact that the application was made in respect of pharmaceutical substances indicates that it is in a similar field that the applicants' user is contemplated. Since the evidence discloses a genuine business on the part of the opponents in their country of origin, and that the advertisements made in respect of that business might reach this country and appear in libraries or places of reference frequented by medical men, I think that I am bound to envisage that, with the passage of time, some conflict may occur in the minds of the trade between the use of the mark by the applicants and the advertisement and user of the mark overseas by the opponents. Having regard to the international character which medicine and the allied sciences have increasingly assumed over the last two decades, the court must be careful to see that in exercising its discretion under the Act the public interest is not in any way imperilled. I am not satisfied that the public interest will best be served by permitting the registration by manufacturers in this country as a brand name for a pharmaceutical substance a word in fact used by an American corporation in respect of the same material, and which is advertised in journals, which on the evidence are received and referred to in this country. Accordingly, on both those grounds it is my duty to hold that the application should not be permitted to proceed. In arriving at that conclusion I have done so upon materials which were not available to the assistant-comptroller.

VITAMINS LD.'S APPLICATION, In re.

Lloyd-Jacob J.

so as from June, 1946, and sales by auction were then reintroduced. The price of woollen goods in Australia remained controlled, however, as it had been during the war, and since in those circumstances auction prices might be uneconomic for local manufacturers of woollen goods a scheme of subsidies was introduced, the object being to enable the manufacturers to sell in the home market at the controlled prices. The basis of the scheme appeared from some 36 letters, covering the period from 1946 to 1948, written on behalf of the respondent to manufacturers, of whom the appellant company was one, and which, inter alia, made provision for the proposed subsidy and the method of its calculation, and stated that the scheme would be vested in and under the control of the Australian Wool Realization Commission. Correspondence subsequent to June, 1948, stated, in effect, that, subsidy was returnable or not claimable on stocks in hand at Christmas, 1948.

The appellant company contended that the letters of 1946 to 1948 constituted a series of contracts—offers which were accepted by a purchase of wool—under which they were entitled to subsidy on all purchases between June, 1946, and June, 1948, and under that head they claimed a sum of £108,871; they also claimed a sum of £67,282 which they had been called upon to refund to the respondent on the termination of the scheme and which they had paid under protest, making a total claim of £176,153. Before the Commission the appellant had also claimed a sum of £92,002 in respect of unsubsidized wool bought and used between June and Christmas, 1948, but that claim had been refused by the Commission on the ground that there was no authority to subsidize wool purchased after July 31, 1948, when the scheme came to an end, and that claim did not form part of the present action.

The respondent pleaded that there were no contracts, that the basis of the scheme was not contractual but administrative, and that the letters contained statements of policy and not contractual offers. There was in fact no contract form signed by each party. The respondent also alleged that the £67,282 was properly repaid in accordance with the scheme:—

Held, (1) that the letters of 1946 to 1948, which were to be read as a whole, could not be read as an offer or offers to contract. They contained a statement of policy. The "scheme" was to be administered by the Commission which was itself to determine the amount of the subsidy. If the intention had been to provide for a series of contracts one would, as between the parties, have expected a form containing the provisions which, if disputes arose, would be construed and applied by the courts. The number of uncertain factors made it natural that the basis should be administrative. Accordingly, there was no contractual right to a subsidy and the appellants' claim under that head failed.

(2) It was within the discretion of the Commission in computing refund not to have regard to the usage of unsubsidized wool bought and used between June and Christmas, 1948, and the respondent was therefore entitled to demand the £67,282 without regard to that user.

Judgment of the High Court of Australia affirmed.

Appeal (No. 23 of 1955), by special leave, by the Australian Woollen Mills Ltd. from a judgment of the High Court of Australia (Dixon C.J., Williams, Webb, Fullagar and Kitto JJ.) (May 4, 1954) given in its original jurisdiction in favour of the respondent, the Commonwealth of Australia, in an action brought against it by the appellant for the sum of £176,153 8s. 10d.

The action first came on for hearing before Kitto J. who, after taking evidence both oral and documentary, directed pursuant to section 18 of the Judiciary Act, 1903–1950, that the case should be argued before the Full Court.

The facts appear from the judgment of the Judicial Committee.

Nov. 23. The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by LORD SOMERVELL OF HARROW. This is an appeal, by special leave, from an order of the High Court entering judgment for the repondent with costs.

The appellant manufactures woollen and worsted goods for the Australian market. During the war years the respondent bought all the Australian wool clip. The sale of that wool to the United Kingdom excluded wool required for local manufacture. There was control by the respondent of prices for woollen and worsted goods. The sales by the respondent to the appellant and other manufacturers were at a price fixed with reference to the controlled prices of the manufactured articles. This is described by the High Court as "in effect" a subsidy. There is a small item of claim in this case, £2,121, which relates to wool purchased by the appellant in the period 1942–1946 when the position was as above. For reasons which will appear the decision in this case does not require an investigation of the provisions of that procedure. This appeal arises out of and depends on the arrangements made for 1946–1947 and 1947–1948.

The respondent ceased as from June, 1946, the beginning of the season, to buy all the wool clip and auctions were then reintroduced. The prices of woollen and worsted goods were still controlled. It was realized that the auction prices which local manufacturers with others would have to pay might be such that the manufacturers could not manufacture to sell at the controlled prices unless they got financial assistance. There was therefore a scheme of subsidies in respect of purchases of wool to be manufactured into articles for the home market.

The appellant claims that under this scheme the subsidy payments became due to it under a series of contracts. There was no contract form signed by each party. The appellant contends that the letters to which reference will be made later constituted offers, the terms of which were varied from time to time, to be accepted by a purchase by a manufacturer, and further contends that under these contracts it is entitled to subsidy on all purchases between June, 1946, and June, 1948. The actual way in which the sums claimed are arrived at depends on later complications, which will emerge in due course.

The first answer of the respondent to this claim is that there were no contracts; that the basis of the scheme was not contractual but administrative, and that the letters contained statements of policy and not contractual offers. In the alternative, the respondent submits that if there were contracts nothing is due under them. This is based on a contention that the respondent was entitled to refuse to pay subsidy on stocks over a certain amount held at the end of the scheme and to reclaim subsidy on such stocks if already paid. The respondent maintains that if there were contracts they contained a term to that effect.

There are other issues which it is desirable to indicate in outline. The subsidy was discontinued as from July 31, 1948. Price control of woollen goods by the respondent came to an end in September, 1948. It passed to the States. There is no evidence as to what was the exact position after that date.

Under the scheme the subsidy had been paid shortly after the purchases of wool. The object of the subsidy was to enable manufacturers to sell in the home market at the controlled prices, and if the products made with the wool were exported it is not disputed that the subsidy had to be repaid, whatever the legal position. The respondent also claimed that reasonable stocks only were eligible for subsidy. If and when the scheme came to an end subsidy had been paid on stocks purchased in excess of a reasonable quantity it had to be repaid. A fortiori, no subsidy was claimable on such stocks if there had been no payment. Reference has already been made to the respondent's contention that if there were contracts this was a term of them.

Correspondence passed between the parties in the period following June, 1948. The respondent claimed that the appellant had to repay £67,282 on the grounds hereinbefore set out. The appellant paid this sum on May 9, 1949, at the same time putting forward a claim to £92,000 the basis of which will be explained later.

The appellant's main claim includes this £67,282 which, apart from the small item of £2,121, represents subsidy on wool bought in the period June, 1946, to July, 1948. It submits in the first instance that the repayment should be disregarded or treated as provisional. It has, however, an alternative claim for this sum as money had and received to its use, it having been paid, as it is alleged, under protest and without prejudice. This claim is maintained, though it be held that there were no contracts, on the following ground. Although a scheme of this kind be administrative and not contractual in that the party subsidized could not sue at law, still the respondent, it is said, could not recover back money that had once been paid. In the present case the respondent did not suggest that if wool had in fact been turned into goods which had been marketed in the home market, there could be a claim for repayment of subsidy already paid. The respondent does, however, submit that having regard to the general and special provisions of this scheme it was entitled to demand the repayment of the sums which made up the £67,282.

This alternative claim of the appellant raises two issues. First, was the respondent entitled under the scheme to demand the repayment of the money? Secondly, if it was not so entitled, was the "protest" of such a nature as to entitle the appellant to sue for the recovery of money paid?

These in outline are the issues.

The first, contract or no contract, turns on the construction of the letters. The appellant submitted that in construing them the Board should have regard to the fact that the respondent had substantial stocks of wool of which it would be anxious to dispose. Their Lordships get no assistance from this fact. There is no ground for suggesting that this "interest" of the respondent in any way entered into this scheme.

The appellant further submitted that the respondent wanted the manufacturers to purchase so that there could be woollen goods on the home market. There was therefore an implied request to do so. Let this be admitted. It does not appear to their Lordships to advance the argument. There may be cases where the absence of a request negatives the existence of a contract. The presence of a request does not, however, in itself establish a contract. Manufacturers may be requested to come into and work a non-contractual scheme. On this aspect of the argument their Lordships think, with all respect, there was force in the criticism of that passage in the judgment of the High Court in which it is said that there was nothing in the nature of a request or invitation.

The terms of the contract are said to be contained in some 36 letters covering the period from 1946 to 1948. In considering whether a series of contracts were made the first two or three letters setting out the lines of the scheme are decisive. If these letters constituted a contractual offer the later letters could be read as varying its items; if they do not constitute a contractual offer there is nothing in the later letters which does so. The first letter is from the Commonwealth Prices Branch to the Associated Woollen and Worsted Textile Manufacturers, of which the appellant is a member. The second letter is from the Wool Realization Commission to the appellant. It is desirable to set out these two letters in full.

" relating to the subsidization of raw wool purchased by Australian Manufacturers for domestic consumption under auction conditions which will operate after June 30, 1946.

" The Commonwealth Government has decided that subsidy will be paid to maintain the price of wool purchased for domestic use by Australian manufacturers when auctions recommence after June 30, 1946.

" The subsidy will be calculated as the difference between the present basic price of wool for domestic consumption and the average market price for each auction series. Manufacturers will be required to carry any excess cost by puchasing above average market level, but under certain specified conditions, will be allowed the benefit of keen buying at lower than average market level. The amount of subsidy payable will be as determined by the Australian Wool Realization Commission.

" The administration of the scheme will be vested in the Australian Wool Realization Commission and complete details of procedure will be made available to your members as soon as possible.

The Secretary, National Council of Wool Selling Brokers of Australia, 120, King Street, Melbourne, Vic."

" PRESS STATEMENT of Minister for Trade and Customs.

" The Minister for Trade and Customs (Senator J. M. Fraser) announced today that subsidy would be paid to maintain existing prices of wool to Australian manufacturers for utilization in goods for domestic consumption, when auction sales recommence after June 30, 1946.

" The purpose of the subsidy is to enable Australian manufacturers to compete with overseas buyers in a manner that will avoid interference with normal auction purchases.

" Senator Fraser stated that subsidies would be paid to manufacturers to reimburse any excess paid in purchasing at prices for domestic consumption but not in excess of the average market level for individual wool types at a series of auction sales. This ensures that manufacturers will not bid extravagantly on the assumption that the Commonwealth Government will meet deficiencies resulting from unlimited bidding.

" ' The aim of the proposal,' said Senator Fraser, ' is to place ' ' Australian manufacturers as near as possible in the same ' ' bidding position as if they were buying in a competitive ' ' market prior to the war. As an inducement to efficient ' ' buying manufacturers will obtain benefits from purchases ' ' made below average market level. The scheme will be so ' ' designed as to ensure rapid payment of subsidy and will be " ' administered by the Australian Wool Realization Commission " ' on behalf of the Commonwealth Government and the amount " ' of subsidy payable to manufacturers will be as determined " ' by the Commission.' Canberra. A.C.T. June, 1946."

" Australian Wool Realization Commission to Australian " Woollen Mills Pty. Limited. Head Office: Pitman House, " 540–542, Little Collins Street, Melbourne. C.I. August 7, " 1946. Dear Sir, The Commonwealth Government proposes to " grant a subsidy on wool purchased at auction by Australian " manufacturers in the 1946/47 season, and this Commission has " been charged with the calculation and payment of the subsidy.

" The Commission realizes the necessity for as prompt pay- " ment of the subsidy as possible to manufacturers, and full " details of subsidy procedure will be made available to all " manufacturers at an early date. However, the following " interim information is advised to you in respect of the pro- " cedure to operate for subsidy on wools purchased for Australian " Manufacturers at auction:—(A) In general, subsidy on wool " purchased at auction will be paid by this Commission in full " immediately the amounts have been computed for each series. " (B) It is anticipated that payments will be completed within " 28 days from the close of each series. (C) Payment will be " automatically made from the Commission's records of auction " results and no claim will be required from the manufacturer. " (D) With each payment, there will be forwarded a statement " showing in respect of each lot purchased—(i) The basic cost " assessed, i.e., at present, appraisement plus 10 per cent. for " fleece wools and appraisement plus 5 per cent. for skin wools. " (ii) The average greasy market price established. (iii) The " subsidy as calculated by the Commission.

" In discussions between the Commission and the Advisory " Committee of Woollen and Worsted Manufacturers on March " 19 and 20, 1946, manufacturers were advised of the Commis- " sion's responsibilities as to ensuring that the reserve prices for " Australian-grown wool, provided for under the United Kingdom- " Dominions Wool Disposals Plan, are made effective; and it was " understood at that meeting that members of your association " would be willing to purchase all wool required by your " members at auction with the following exceptions:—(A) Wool " produced by the manufacturer himself and used by him in his " own factory. (B) Wool purchased by a country manufacturer " on a normal quantitative basis according to his normal policy " from producers in his district. (C) Wool the product of fell- " mongering the skins owned by the manufacturer and used by " him in a continuous process of manufacture.

" You should note that auction purchases of raw wool will pro- " vide the basis of subsidy to manufacturers in so far as such wool " is used in the manufacture of goods sold for Australian " domestic consumption, and therefore any manufacturer who " does not buy his wool at auction will have to submit to the

AUSTRALIAN WOOLLEN MILLS LTD. v. COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA.

" Commission an application for subsidy, and in each case he will " need to supply:—(A) The names of the persons from whom " he has bought wool. (B) The quantities purchased from each " of these persons, and full details of the description and prices " of such purchases.

" As stated previously, when a manufacturer purchases wool " at auction, it will not be necessary for him to submit an " application to the Commission for subsidy because the Commis- " sion will have available to it from its records of auction results " all the necessary information for calculation of the subsidy and " automatic payment to the manufacturer.

" It should also be noted that a manufacturer purchasing " wool other than at auction will not receive subsidy up to " average market level when the price paid by him for such " wool is below average auction level. The subsidy, in this case, " will be the difference between basic cost and the actual price " paid by the manufacturer for the wool in question, whereas in " the case of wool purchased through auction the subsidy will " be the difference between the basic price and the average " auction market level, irrespective of the auction price paid for " the wool.

" The attention of manufacturers is also drawn particularly to " section 17 of the Wool (Contributory Charge) Assessment Act, " 1945, which reads:—' Except in pursuance of an arrangement " ' with the Commissioner, a person shall not subject any wool, " ' other than wool purchased by him, to any process or treat- " ' ment of manufacture, or export any wool, unless—(a) The " ' wool has first been submitted at an appraisement place or, " ' with the approval of the Commission, at any other place, for " ' appraisement by or on behalf of the Commission, and has " ' been so appraised; or (b) He is in possession of a certificate " ' issued in respect of the wool under section fifteen of this " ' Act. Penalty: Two hundred pounds.'

" In submitting wool purchased by a manufacturer, otherwise " than at auction, for appraisement for purposes of the Con- " tributory Charge Assessment Act, the prescribed form must be " completed and forwarded to the Commission.

" To enable the wool to be properly examined and appraised it " will be necessary for such wool to be displayed in accordance " with instructions from the Commission and on premises " approved by the Commission as suitable for the appraisement " of wool. If the premises of the manufacturer are unsuitable for " this purpose, the Commission may order the wool elsewhere for " appraisement.

" The Commission is endeavouring to communicate with all " Woollen and Worsted Textile Manufacturers understood not to " be members of the Association, and to advise them of the " above arrangement which, of course, must apply on the same " basis to all manufacturers of goods made from wool.

" The Commission is charged by the Government with the " responsibility of doing all things necessary to ensure that the " United Kingdom-Dominion Wool Disposals Plan is successful, " particularly in regard to making effective the reserve prices " provided for under the plan, and the Commission feels sure " that you will co-operate in every way possible. Yours faith- " fully, (Sgd.) H. B. LEIGH, Secretary. The Manager, Australian " Woollen Mills Pty. Limited, 46, Martin Place, Sydney, " N.S.W."

Their Lordships are of opinion that these letters cannot be read as an offer or offers to contract. They contain a statement of policy. The " scheme " is to be administered by the Commission which is itself to determine the amount of the subsidy. No single phrase or provision may be decisive. The letters must be read as a whole. If the intention had been to provide for a series of contracts one would as between these parties have expected a form containing the provisions which, if disputes arose, would be construed and applied by the courts. The number of uncertain factors make it natural that the basis should be administrative. Nor is there anything remarkable in the fact that the manufacturers should be content to act on the respondent's statement of policy. A further letter of August 20 elaborating the procedure emphasizes the control which the respondent through the Commission was keeping on the scheme.

The later letters contain no sentences which support the appellant's contention and many which illustrate the administrative nature of the scheme. Some of these are cited below in dealing with the later points.

It is unnecessary, therefore, to consider the respondent's alternative claim that if there were contracts the terms have been fulfilled, but it is necessary to consider on the appellant's alternative claim whether the respondent under the scheme was entitled to demand the repayment of the £67,282.

It was not disputed that the subsidy could be demanded back if goods made with the wool " subsidized " were exported. This was referred to in a letter from the Commission of August 20, 1946. As and from March 20, 1947, the appellant, with other manufacturers, was required to sign a declaration to be forwarded with its subsidy statements. It contained the following provisions—" (a) that the wool shown in this statement will be used " by the said manufacturer for purposes of manufacture of goods " within the Commonwealth (excluding goods which are notified " to me as being ineligible for such subsidy); (b) that the above- " mentioned wool or no part of that wool will be resold without " prior notification being given to the Australian Wool Realization " Commission (for these purposes ' resold ' is deemed to include " any transfer of title in wool oddments or offsorts for a considera- " tion or as remuneration or part-remuneration to any person " processing such wool on behalf of a manufacturer); (c) that if " all or any of the wool is not for any reason used for manufac- " ture of goods eligible for subsidy, the subsidy paid will be

"refunded to the Australian Wool Realization Commission as "agent for the Commonwealth; (d) that the above information is "a true and correct statement of wool for manufacture of sub- "sidized goods within the Commonwealth purchased by the said "manufacturer at the auction series for which this statement is "submitted."

As the High Court point out, the subsidy is regarded as on the manufactured goods rather than on the wool, though paid conditionally on the purchases of the wool.

The question of excess stocks is dealt with in a circular letter from the Commission of April 21, 1947:—"Pitman House, 540– "542, Little Collins St., Melbourne, C.1. April 21, 1947. "Dear Sir, The purpose of this letter is to inform you of an "instruction received by the Commission from the Common- "wealth Prices Commissioner, relating to a condition governing "the payment of subsidy on raw wool purchased during the "remainder of the 1946/47 season.

"The Commonwealth Prices Commissioner has ruled that "subsidization of wool purchased by manufacturers during the "1946/47 season is proposed only on the quantity of wool neces- "sary for the manufacturer to carry on his normal manufacturing "activities to June 30, 1947, and for such period after that date "during which he is unable to obtain supplies of wool from the "market.

"If any manufacturer is found to have purchased wool in "excess of these requirements, payment of subsidy on such "excess will be withheld by the Commission. Yours faithfully, "(Sgd.) J. H. WILLIS, for Secretary."

The point was further emphasized on January 30, 1948.

At some date during that year the question of the respon- dent's ceasing to control the prices came under consideration and there was clearly no question of the respondent continuing the subsidy after that. As the whole purpose of the scheme was to enable manufacturers to keep in business at the controlled price it would be contrary to the scheme if there was a subsidizing to any substantial extent of goods to be sold after control had ceased.

The last paragraph of a letter of February 20, 1948, is relevant: "It is important to note that there is no guarantee "that stocks held at June 30, 1948, will remain subsidized to the "present basis. All or portion of the subsidy on stocks held at "that date may be adjusted by the Commonwealth Government "if it deems such action necessary. This should be borne in "mind in the formulation of purchasing programmes as well as "the fact that subsidy may be withheld forthwith on purchases "which are deemed excessive or inappropriate to a mill's "functions."

Early in June, 1948, there was an announcement that the subsidy would be discontinued as from July 31. In a letter of June 18 the Commission reminded manufacturers of the previous ruling as to reasonable stocks and invited discussions as to what would be reasonable stocks at June 30. The first results of these discussions was a decision by the Commission that 5½ months' stocks would be reasonable. Control ceased in September. There was a complication as to equalizing stocks among manufacturers which does not help in the present issue. On August 30, 1948, the Commission wrote a letter from which the following is an extract:—

"Adjustment of subsidy on stocks in excess of 5½ months' "requirements as from June 30, 1948.

"The Commonwealth Prices Commissioner has now declared "that goods manufactured from wool stocks in excess of 5½ "months' normal requirements from June 30, 1948, are ineligible "for wool subsidy. Therefore, in accordance with sub-paragraph "(c) of the conditions under which subsidy has been claimed on "wool (see Declaration by Manufacturer on reverse of subsidy "claim form) the subsidy on wool stocks in excess of this period "will be either withheld in cases where payment has not yet "been made or must be refunded to the Commission as agent "for the Commonwealth Government if payment of subsidy has "already been made.

"In making these adjustments the Commission will adopt "the following procedure:—(A) Advise the manufacturer of the "amount by which his stocks held, in the opinion of the Com-"mission, exceed 5½ months' requirements from June 30, 1948. "(B) Invite him to give a considered estimate of what groups and "styles of wool will be in stock at the Christmas 1948 closedown. "(C) In formulating the basis for refund or adjustment regard will "be had initially for the level of wool values ruling over the last "six months of the 1947/48 wool season and not necessarily "to the level established on the last purchases made. (D) An "interim determination as to withholding or refund will be given "by the Commission as soon as practicable in the case of each "mill to give each a basis of adjustment. The interim deter-"mination may be reviewed by the Commission or the Common-"wealth Prices Commissioner. Payments will be made on "outstanding claims forthwith within the framework of the "procedure outlined."

Their Lordships are of opinion that those adjustments were plainly in accordance with the scheme. If a manufacturer had had subsidy on more than the 5½ months' stock it could have been reclaimed. There was, however, a modification and a special circumstance affecting the appellant which must now be considered.

In September the appellant suggested that it would be fairer to take the actual figures of stocks used over 5½ months from June 30 rather than an estimate. The Commission accepted this in principle and in a long letter of December 15 set out their final basis for winding up the scheme. In effect, subsidy was returnable or not claimable on stocks in hand at Christmas, 1948. This was to adopt the actual user test if over that period only wool bought in the subsidy period had been used. Wool bought before the 1946/47 season was, if still on hand, to be treated as "subsidized" having received an indirect subsidy as set out above. That explains how the item of £2,121 relating to wool bought before the scheme comes into the appellant's claim for the return of £67,282. It may be asked how the Commission was justified in going back to pre-1946 purchases or perhaps to purchases before March, 1947. No objection on this ground was taken by the appellant. These parcels had not in fact been used for goods for the home market though on hand for more than 21 months. It might also be said that these parcels should, as it were, be set against later purchases in fact used on which subsidy would be retained. This is speculation, no objection having been taken on these lines. Their Lordships are satisfied that the basis was in accordance with the general principles of the scheme as applicable to the situation which had arisen.

There remains the last paragraph of the letter which was as follows: "Usage of unsubsidized wool before the Christmas 1948 "closedown. 9. If any manufacturer has used unsubsidized wool "in manufacture prior to the Christmas 1948 closedown, the "Commonwealth Prices Commissioner may have regard to such "usage in computing any refund in respect of subsidized stocks "in excess of the prescribed maxima. It is necessary for such "consideration that the following conditions are observed:— "(a) That the wool was purchased at auction. (b) That no relief "has been obtained by means of price increase. (c) That sub-"sidized goods have not been withheld from the consumer. "(d) That the manufacturer has kept satisfactory records and "otherwise complied with the requirements of the National "Security (Prices) Regulations."

In a letter of January 12, 1949, the appellant stated that it had used unsubsidized wool and that the conditions of paragraph 9 had been complied with.

On February 25, 1949, the Commission set out their claim against the appellant. The appellant had substantial stocks at Christmas, 1948, on which it had received subsidy. It had claims in respect of wool used before Christmas on which subsidy had not been paid. On balance and subject to final audit the amount refundable and claimed was £67,282 4s. 9d.

On April 13 there was a further demand and a statement that if no reply was received within 10 days the matter would be referred to the Crown Law Authorities.

On May 9 the appellant wrote two letters. In one it enclosed a cheque for £67,282 4s. 9d. In the other it elaborated its claim in respect of the "unsubsidized" wool bought and used between June and Christmas, 1948. This was stated to be 2,115 bales and the claim in respect of it was said to be £92,000. Although paragraph 9 of the letter of December 15 was referred to, the words used can be read as claiming subsidy on these bales which were bought after the scheme had come to an end. The claim was so treated by the Commission and the Commonwealth Prices branch by letters dated May 19 and July 19 and refused. In answer to this there was a solicitor's letter and these proceedings were started, in which no claim based on these bales, or on any adjustment consequent on their purchase, was made. It is one of the curious features of this case that the appellant did not state clearly its present submission that the claim as then made was not for subsidy on the 2,115 bales as such but that the Commission should have regard to the usage of unsubsidized wool as suggested in paragraph 9 of the letter of December 15. If this had been done there might have been some light on the Commission's reasons for not operating paragraph 9. In their Lordships' opinion it was within the discretion of the respondent not to have regard to the user referred to in paragraph 9. The respondent was therefore entitled to demand the £67,282 without regard to that user.

Their Lordships have thought it right to consider this issue on its merits rather than by approaching first the question whether circumstances which entitle a plaintiff to recover back money paid, which it was not liable to pay, were present in this case. Although the appellant clearly preserved its right to proceed with the counterclaim, as it was called, based on the 2,115 bales, that is not what it is now seeking to do. It is unnecessary to decide the point, but the appellant might well have failed to surmount the obstacles which the law places in the path of those who seek to recover back money paid.

In the result, their Lordships agree with the decision of the High Court. They will humbly advise Her Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed. The appellant will pay the costs of the appeal.

lengthy investment clause of a complicated character and doubts had arisen as to its scope. The trustees of the settlement applied by summons to have the effect of the investment clause decided. The defendants to the summons were the tenant for life and four infants who had contingent reversionary interests in the settled property. Immediately after the issue of the summons, the parties applied for leave to compromise the proceedings upon the terms that a new and modern investment clause be substituted for the old investment clause. Danckwerts J. refused to sanction the proposed compromise on the ground that the jurisdiction of the Chancery Division did not extend to sanctioning a transaction of this character and, in any event, the transaction was not one which the court ought to sanction:—

Held, that if there were here a compromise the Court of Appeal would not be justified in interfering with Danckwerts J.'s refusal to approve it.

Quaere whether, having regard to the language of Lord Simonds and of Lord Morton in Chapman v. Chapman [1954] A.C. 429, 445, 461; [1954] 2 W.L.R. 723; [1954] 1 All E.R. 798, 802, 814, the proposed transaction was a compromise of disputed rights which the court had jurisdiction to sanction.

Decision of Danckwerts J. affirmed.

APPEAL from Danckwerts J.

By a resettlement dated January 31, 1940, made between Percy Horace Gordon Powell-Cotton of the first part the first defendant Christopher Powell-Cotton of the second part and trustees of the third part, certain freehold properties and capital moneys were, in the events which had happened, held on trust for the first defendant for his life, and after his death for his issue in tail (at the date of the summons he had no issue), with remainder to the second defendant Michael Cotton-Garratt for life, with divers remainders to take effect on his death. Clause 12 of the settlement contained a long and complicated investment clause which, inter alia, authorized the investment of capital moneys "in preferred stock or shares" and in "ordinary pre-"ferred stock or shares." The facts are more fully stated in the judgment of Evershed M.R.

The trustees, being uncertain about the exact scope of the investment clause, took out an originating summons raising certain questions of construction as to its meaning. The defendants to the summons were the first defendant, the tenant for life in possession, the second defendant, who was entitled to a contingent reversionary life interest, and three defendants, who had contingent reversionary interests in the settled property. The last four defendants were infants.

When the summons came before the master the parties applied for leave to compromise the questions raised by the summons on the terms that a new and modern investment clause should be substituted for that contained in clause 12 of the resettlement.

Danckwerts J. refused to sanction the proposed compromise and gave to the parties leave to appeal.

The first and fifth defendants appealed.

G. A. Rink for the appellants.

Peter W. E. Taylor for the plaintiffs, respondents.

Michael Browne for the respondents the second, third and fourth defendants.

The following cases, which were not referred to in the judgments, were cited in argument: In re Hylton's Settlement [1]; Brooke v. Lord Mostyn [2]; Huddersfield Banking Co. Ltd. v. Henry Lister & Son Ltd. [3]; Sneath v. Valley Gold Ltd. [4]

EVERSHED M.R. Danckwerts J. gave leave for this case to be considered by the Court of Appeal, the question being whether the court could or should sanction, by way of what was called a compromise, the substitution for an old-fashioned investment clause in a strict settlement of realty and personalty of a modern investment power which would give to the trustees, particularly, a power to invest capital moneys in what are commonly called "equities." I cannot do better, I think, than cite the language of the counsel who has advised the infants: "The existing narrower investment clause," he said, "may "therefore actually have a detrimental effect on security of "investment by making the trustees select the best of a rather "restricted category instead of the best available, and a well-"drawn modern investment clause would therefore be for the "benefit of the infants." The proposal is that the court should sanction the substitution for the narrower old-fashioned clause of "a well-drawn modern investment clause."

It is, of course, plain enough that the court has not the power, and never has assumed that it had the power, to improve upon the performance of the settlor by substituting for some provision which he inserted restricting the power of trustees to make investments a much better more modern clause—on the ground that so to do would be for the benefit of all persons existing and to come into existence under the settlement. But the case for the appellants (the adult beneficiary, supported by the infant beneficiaries) is that a doubt or difficulty of construction—I avoid the word "dispute" for there never really was any dispute—has arisen as to the meaning of the clause which the settlor selected. The clause was very long and in some measure undoubtedly repetitive. Having mentioned Government securities, freehold mortgages and the like, the settlor proceeded to empower his trustees to invest "in or upon the debenture stock or rentcharge "guaranteed or preferred stock or shares of any company incor-"porated by special Act or by or under any public general Act "or Acts of the Imperial Parliament or the legislature of any "colony or Royal Charter or in or upon the ordinary stock or "shares of any such company a fixed or minimum rate of interest

" or dividend on which is guaranteed by the Government of the " United Kingdom or India or any colony or any foreign govern- " ment or state or in or upon ordinary preferred stock or shares " but not on deferred stock or shares of any such company." Then the mind of the settlor passed to municipal authorities.

The question, said to be one of doubt, which has arisen is this: The phrase " ordinary preferred stock " (though I assume that it came from the precedent book) is unusual, and has, I think, next to no actual application today. An affidavit of an experienced stockbroker was filed in which he said that the phrase was a term of art, which in a sense surprised me. He said: " I have come across the term ' ordinary preferred shares ' " in an investment clause. . . . My recollection is that such " clauses are used in old trusts established many years ago. I " am not aware of any company having shares so described in its " articles." Transposing the language, the term " preferred " ordinary " is, of course, much more common; but the suggestion is that there has been a slip—that perhaps the word " or " or the word " and " was missed from between the words " ordinary " and " preferred," so that the clause would run " or in " or upon ordinary or preferred stock but not on deferred stock."

That view of construction (upon which, of course, I do not pronounce) would, if accepted, lead to the result that it rendered quite nugatory and futile the very special provisions which immediately precede it to the effect that investment in ordinary stock or shares can be made only where a minimum rate of dividend is guaranteed by Government authority. However, I will proceed upon the view that here there is a doubt—a question of the meaning and intention of this somewhat old-fashioned clause.

That being so, it is contended that it is permissible (and within the jurisdiction of the court) to accede to the request that the compromise of that question by the substitution of an entirely new investment clause should be sanctioned by the court on behalf of the beneficiaries now infants or not yet in being; and the case is put on the broad proposition that the word " compromise " covers any resolution not merely of a dispute or actual controversy, but also of any question of doubt or difficulty.

Danckwerts J. rejected that application and although we have no note of his judgment, I gather that he did so on two grounds: He said that the " dressing up " of this case as one of a compromise of a dispute was really quite false—I am not using these words in any offensive sense—that it did not in the least degree really represent the true situation. " I do not think," I understood him to have said, " that in such a case as this the jurisdic- " tion of the Chancery court extends to granting the request put " to it, and I also do not think in the exercise of my discretion " that this is the sort of thing which in any case the court in its " discretion (if it has any) ought to do."

It has been said many times how useful is the jurisdiction in chambers of the Chancery judges to entertain all manner of problems that arise in the execution of trusts, and particularly to look after the interests of infants; and I always feel most unwilling in the Court of Appeal to lay down principles and rules which may fetter undesirably that very useful jurisdiction. Bearing that in mind, I for my part prefer to base my own conclusion, in rejecting this appeal, upon the second ground; namely, that, if it could be said here that there was a question being compromised, nevertheless I would feel quite unjustified in interfering with the view which the judge took in his discretion that to substitute an entirely new modern investment clause for that which was found in the settlement was not the right way of treating the matter. In a sense, that is really all that need be said.

But the other broader question of jurisdiction was argued, and perhaps I should say just a word about it, although I want to avoid laying down any hard and fast rule, or indeed expressing any final definite conclusion upon it. We were referred to the language used particularly by Lord Simonds and Lord Morton of Henryton in the recent case of Chapman v. Chapman.[1] It had there been argued that the jurisdiction of the Chancery court was of the widest and most unrestricted character possible; that the court could sanction anything to which the label of "arrangement" could be attached, by way of variation of the terms of existing settlements, so long only as the adult beneficiaries agreed, and that it was for the benefit of beneficiaries who were infants or not yet in being.

The door to that spacious jurisdiction was, I think, firmly closed by the House of Lords, and I am by no means sure that, if Mr. Rink's argument and Mr. Browne's argument in its full effect were accepted, the result would not be to reopen that door. I would like to cite one or two passages from the speeches in the Chapman case. Thus, Lord Simonds said[2]: "So, too, the "court had power in the administration of trust property to "direct that by way of salvage some transaction unauthorized "by the trust instrument should be carried out. Nothing is "more significant than the repeated assertions by the court that "mere expediency was not enough to found the jurisdiction. "Lastly, and I can find no other than these four categories, the "court had power to sanction a compromise by an infant in a "suit to which that infant was a party by next friend or guardian "ad litem. This jurisdiction, it may be noted, is exercisable "alike in the Queen's Bench Division and the Chancery Division "and whether or not the court is in course of executing a trust. "This brings me to the question which alone presents any difficulty in this case. It is whether this fourth category, which I "may call the compromise category, should be extended to cover

" cases in which there is no real dispute as to rights and, there" fore, no compromise, but it is sought by way of bargain between " the beneficiaries to rearrange the beneficial interests under the " trust instrument."

Then Lord Morton, upon the same point, said [3]: " There are,
" of course, many cases to be found in the reports in which the " Court of Chancery, and its successor the Chancery Division, " have approved compromises of disputed rights on behalf of " infants interested under a will or settlement and on behalf also " of possible after-born beneficiaries. . . . Where rights are in " dispute, and the court approves a compromise, it is not altering
" the trusts, for the trusts are, ex hypothesi, still in doubt and
" unascertained."

That proposition and those views were later expanded. I need not read the whole of the passage to which our attention has already been directed. I refer to the paragraph beginning [4]: " This argument brings one face to face with the vitally important " question—is it possible to draw a line at some point between " the court's undoubted jurisdiction to sanction a compromise of " disputed rights, and the alleged unlimited jurisdiction to alter " beneficial interests to any extent. . . ." It will be noticed that in all those passages, the subject-matter of the alleged compromise must be (and I cite again the last passage I have quoted) " a compromise of disputed rights."

We are here concerned with a discretionary power given to trustees as regards investment. It is said, and I will again assume, that the precise scope of that power is not clear, and is open to real and substantial argument. Still, it seems to me very doubtful, to say the least, whether it could be said that as between the beneficiaries in this case there is any dispute as to their rights. That has been made manifest by the circumstance that, as Mr. Browne freely confessed, the advantage which he sought for his infants lay not in any give and take with somebody who had other rights, but in the mere circumstance that, if a much more modern investment clause was substituted, the trustees (if they exercised their powers sensibly) would benefit everybody all round.

Without, therefore, saying more for reasons which I have already indicated, I am bound to say that, as at present advised, I am not satisfied that this court can now, in loyalty to the principles laid down in Chapman's case,[5] accept the wide significance which, for purposes of jurisdiction, Mr. Rink and Mr. Browne would assign to the word " compromise." It may well be that powers which are expressed with uncertainty may give rise to questions of dispute as to rights. But in this case I think (as I have earlier said) that the judge rightly thought that the simple question, and the compromise of that question sought to be achieved, was really " dressed up " in the sense that in truth here the advisers of the persons concerned—no doubt acting in the very best interests of those they represent—have sought and hoped, by fastening upon an ambiguity in a power of investment, to say that that gives them the opportunity of substituting an entirely new investment clause; and, if the matter were complex enough, and the interests sufficiently elaborate, they might go further and say that, without other counter-availing alterations, even that substitution would not suffice; so that, under the pretext of the difficulty of construction in a power, you might in the end almost achieve what, no doubt for many purposes, would be an admirable result, namely, redrafting the settlement from beginning to end. But I base my decision in this case primarily upon the view that, in all the circumstances, I do not think it would be right (or could be suggested to be right) that this court should interfere with the view expressed by Danckwerts J. when he said: "I do not think I ought to make the order which I have "been asked to make."

I think, therefore, that the appeal should be dismissed.

Estoppel — Conduct, by — Patent — Agreement between applicant for letters patent and manufacturer—Sole and exclusive licences to be granted when letters patent sealed — Provision for payment of royalties—Liberty to use inventions pending grant of letters patent — Royalties paid over period — Repudiation of liability to pay royalties — Action for recovery of royalties — Whether defendants estopped from denying liability to pay.

Patent.

On December 24, 1952, an agreement was entered into between the plaintiff, who had lodged at the Patent Office three applications for letters patent and certain foreign applications in connexion with gas-filled lighters and refills, and the defendants, who were then manufacturing and selling such goods. The agreement provided, inter alia; (a) that the plaintiff should himself discontinue the selling of lighters; (b) that when the patents should be granted, the plaintiff should grant to the defendants sole and exclusive licences under such patents (with power to grant sub-licences) for the full term thereof; (c) that pending the grant of such licences the defendants should be entitled to use and exercise the plaintiff's inventions as if licences under the patents had in fact been granted; (d) that during the continuance of the agreement the plaintiff should not himself use or exercise his inventions; (e) that during the continuance of the agreement the defendants should pay to the plaintiff specified royalties on goods sold which embodied the inventions or any of them so long as the inventions embodied should be protected by valid letters patent in the United Kingdom; (f) that the defendants should periodically render accounts and pay royalties to the plaintiff, and (g) that if the royalties should not amount to £2,000 in any one year (and in certain other events) the plaintiff could terminate the licences.

In accordance with the agreement, the plaintiff discontinued the sale of lighters and refills, and from time to time the defendants rendered accounts and paid what were called "royalties" in respect of sales made by them. The plaintiff's complete specifications were accepted and published, but no patents had ever been granted. In December, 1954, the defendants sent a statement to the plaintiff showing that the sum of £7,123 was due for royalties, but shortly afterwards repudiated this liability, and asserted that no royalties were, or ever had been payable, as under the agreement royalties were not payable until British letters patent were granted; and as their lighters and refills did not, on the true construction of the complete specifications as published, embody the plaintiff's inventions. In an action brought to recover the £7,123 stated to be due, Lloyd-Jacob J. gave judgment for the plaintiff. On appeal by the defendants:—

Held, (1) that on the true construction of the agreement the defendants were liable to pay the stipulated royalties during its existence, whether or not British letters patent had been granted; (2) that the conduct of the defendants in paying royalties over a period, thereby inducing the plaintiff to adhere to the agreement in the belief that they admitted that their goods embodied his inventions, constituted an estoppel preventing them from contending otherwise, notwithstanding that the representations arising from such conduct might involve representations of law regarding the true construction of the specifications, and representations as to the defendants' future conduct.

Per Denning L.J. This assurance was binding, no matter whether it is regarded as a representation of law or fact or a mixture of both, and no matter whether it concerns the present or the future. It may not be such as to give rise to an estoppel at common law, strictly so called, for that was confined to representations of existing fact; but we have got far beyond the old common law estoppel now. We have reached a new estoppel which affects legal relations.

Per Hodson L.J. The estoppel set up by the plaintiff was of the kind well recognized at common law. The representations by conduct which the defendants made were perfectly clear and unambiguous, namely, that the articles which they made embodied the inventions which covered the subject-matter of the agreement. That, to my mind, is a representation of fact. It matters not that questions of law may be involved and that it may be necessary to construe the agreement in order to find out whether there is an embodiment. That there may be a mixed question of law and fact does not destroy the estoppel. Nor does it matter that questions of patent law may be involved in considering whether or not there is an invention that is covered by a patent.

Per Morris L.J. It was really a question of fact.

Decision of Lloyd-Jacob J. (1955) 72 R.P.C. 307 affirmed.

APPEAL from Lloyd-Jacob J.

In 1952 the plaintiff was marketing a lighter under the name of the " Bedford " lighter, which was operated by the vaporization of liquid gas contained in the body of the lighter. He had lodged at the Patent Office three applications for letters patent in connexion with such lighters and their refills, and had applied also for foreign patents. At the same time the defendants were marketing lighters and refills of a similar type which, in the plaintiff's view, would infringe the claims of his patents when granted. He informed the defendants of this, and, after negotiations the parties agreed that the plaintiff should discontinue the manufacture of the " Bedford " lighter, and should grant to the defendants full and exclusive licences to exploit his inventions, subject to the payment of royalties.

The arrangement made between the parties was embodied in a formal agreement dated December 24, 1952, which contained the following provisions. " 4 (a). Forthwith upon the grant of " letters patent upon each of the said applications the patentee " shall grant to the licensee a sole and exclusive licence with " power to grant sub-licences under such letters patent for the " full term therefore and prolongation or extension thereof in " the terms set forth in the second schedule hereto. . . . (b) Pend- " ing the grant of such licences the licensee shall be entitled to " use and exercise the said inventions and to make and sell gas " lighters and gas refills in such manner and on such terms as " are hereinafter provided as if such licences had in fact been " granted. (c) The patentee shall not during the continuance " of this agreement except as in clause 8 hereof provided either " by himself or by any agent or licensee (other than the licensee " and its sub-licensees) use or exercise the said inventions or any " of them or manufacture or sell or offer for sale any gas-filled " lighters or any gas refills. . . . 6 (a) The licensee shall during " the continuance of this agreement and subject to the provisions " of clause 8 (c) hereof pay to the patentee the following royalties " upon all articles sold by the licensee or its sub-licensees which " embody the said inventions or any of them whether or not such " sales were within a country in which the said inventions or any " of them are protected by letters patent or like protection so " long as such inventions as may be embodied shall be protected " by currently valid letters patent in the United Kingdom. " (i) The sum of 6d. upon any complete gas lighter embodying " the said inventions or any of them; (ii) the sum of 2d. upon " any gas refill embodying the said inventions or any of " them. . . ." By sub-clause (b) the defendants were required to account for and to pay royalties every two months. By clause 7, they were required to keep books of account, which were to be open to inspection by the plaintiff. By clause 8, the plaintiff was entitled to terminate the licence if in any year the royalties fell below £2,000, and also in certain other circumstances. By clause 15 (b): "If this agreement or any such licence as aforesaid "is terminated by the licensee pursuant to this clause, all "royalties payable hereunder shall be computed and discharged "up to and including the date of such determination."

In accordance with the terms of the agreement the plaintiff discontinued the sale of his lighters and refills and the defendants from time to time accounted for and paid to the plaintiff sums which they described as "royalties," such sums amounting to more than the minimum annual sum of £2,000 mentioned in the agreement. The plaintiff's three complete specifications were accepted by the Patent Office and published, but (for reasons which were not stated) no British or other letters patent had been granted, even at the date of the hearing of the appeal. On December 23, 1954, the defendants' solicitors wrote to the plaintiff's solicitors stating: "We now have pleasure in enclosing "detailed statement in respect of the royalties paid and payable "to Mr. Meller up to November 30, 1954," followed by a statement showing the number of lighters and refills sold, the royalties paid, and indicating that there was due to the plaintiff the sum of £7,123, subject to tax in respect of sales made after March. The defendants did not pay that sum, and soon afterwards repudiated their liability to do so, and asserted that no royalties were or ever had been payable under the agreement.

In an action in which the plaintiff claimed payment of the sum of £7,123, the defendants pleaded (i) that, on the true construction of the agreement, no royalties were payable until valid British letters patent were granted, and (ii) that they were not liable to pay royalties, as the lighters and refills sold by them did not fall within any claim of the complete specifications as published. The plaintiff, in reply, pleaded that by reason of the conduct of the defendants in paying royalties in respect of sales over the period up to March, 1954, they induced him to believe that they admitted that the lighters and refills sold by them embodied the inventions, the subject of the agreement, or some of them, and that they would continue to pay royalties; and that, acting on such belief, the plaintiff did not determine the agreement or grant licences to other manufacturers as otherwise he would have done; and that in the premises the defendants were estopped from denying that their lighters and refills embodied the inventions in question, and/or that royalties were payable thereon.

Lloyd-Jacob J. held that, on its true construction, the agreement required the defendants to pay royalties although no British patents had been granted; he also held that the defendants were estopped by their conduct from denying that their lighters and refills embodied the plaintiff's inventions, and gave judgment for the plaintiff. The defendants appealed.

DENNING L.J. In 1952 Mr. Lyle-Meller invented a new kind of lighter and refill. Instead of the well-known lighter with a wick and petrol, he invented one which was gas-filled, and he made applications for patents in this country and in countries overseas. He was associated with a company which was making them under the name of the Bedford lighter, but he soon found out that A. Lewis and Co. (Westminster) Ltd. were also making gas-filled lighters and were putting them on the market under the name Silver Match lighter. Thereupon Mr. Lyle-Meller said that their lighters would infringe his patent if and when he got it. He pointed out to them that, if he got a patent on his applications, they would have to pay back royalties in respect of infringements from the beginning. After some negotiations an agreement was reached between them on December 24, 1952, as a result of which Mr. Meller's company gave up making the Bedford lighter and he promised to make available to Messrs. Lewis all his information about the invention and not to give any information to anyone else. Messrs. Lewis agreed to pay Mr. Meller a royalty of 6d. upon every complete gas lighter "embody-" ing his inventions," or any of them, and 2d. upon any gas refill which "embodied his inventions" but Mr. Meller had a right, if the royalties did not come to £2,000 a year, to determine the agreement and exploit his inventions elsewhere.

During the next two years Messrs. Lewis made lighters and they paid royalties to Mr. Meller which exceeded £2,000 a year. They rendered statements of account to him, and in a letter on December 23, 1954, their solicitors wrote saying: "We now have "pleasure in enclosing detailed statement in respect of the "royalties paid and payable to Mr. Meller up to November 30, "1954." The detailed statement showed the exact number of lighters which they had made and the royalties which they had paid. It showed that there was still payable in respect of lighters and refills £7,123 4s. 4d., subject, of course, to tax. Within a few weeks, however, Messrs. Lewis repudiated their liability. They have never paid the £7,123 4s. 4d. and Mr. Lyle-Meller has brought this action to recover it. Messrs. Lewis say that the £7,123 4s. 4d. is not payable at all and indeed that they made a mistake in paying the earlier royalties. They say that none were ever payable. They take two entirely new points which they had never thought of in the first two years. Their first point is that no royalties were payable until the patent was actually granted in England and sealed. Their second point is this: "The lighters which we have made and the refills do not "embody your invention, so we are not liable at all."

The first point arises because of a phrase at the end of clause 6 (a), which seems to say that the royalties are only payable "so long as such inventions as may be embodied shall "be protected by currently valid Letters Patent in the United Kingdom." That is the phrase on which the defendants pin their faith. They pick out that one phrase in this agreement and say that it means that no royalties are payable until valid letters patent are issued in the United Kingdom and sealed. I cannot agree with that construction for the simple reason that it flouts nearly every other clause in this agreement. It is in flagrant defiance of the whole tenor of this agreement. If you read through this agreement clause by clause, it is as plain as plain can be that during the currency of this agreement they were to keep accounts of all the lighters that they made; every two months they were to account, and thereupon they were to pay the royalties. I do not think it necessary to travel through this agreement clause by clause except to say that, having regard to clause 4 (b), clause 6 (b) and clause 15 (b), I am of opinion that royalties were payable during this agreement just as if a patent had been granted and as if licences had been granted under it, and that the one phrase which the defendants rely upon does not carry them home. The explanation of this one phrase at the end of 6 (a) was, I think, well given by the judge himself and I adopt what he says about it.

Now for the second point. The defendants say that these lighters which they have made, and the refills also, do not embody the inventions, and they wish the court to embark on a grand inquiry upon that matter. They wish to take the applications for patents and the claims therein, and to go through them and compare the lighters with them to see whether the lighters which they have made would infringe those claims when they are properly construed. The judge has held that it is far too late for them to take that point, seeing that for two years they have paid royalties and accounted on the basis that these lighters did embody the inventions. It was proved to the satisfaction of the judge that if Mr. Meller had had any idea that they would repudiate their liability he would at once have determined the agreement and exploited his inventions elsewhere. This agreement says that if £2,000 was not paid in any year by way of royalties he could determine it, and he said that so he would have done. I have no doubt he would, and the judge has found that he would have done.

Here then is a course of conduct by the defendants, a course of conduct which, in my opinion, amounts to the plainest possible assurance to Mr. Meller in these terms: "We acknowledge that "the lighters and refills which we are making embody your "inventions and that we are liable to pay you royalties thereon." Mr. Meller acted on that assurance and altered his position in this way, that if it had not been given he would undoubtedly have sought to exploit his inventions elsewhere. As it was, he refrained from so doing. The question is whether in the circumstances the assurance is binding on these manufacturers.

Sir Lionel Heald urged us that this course of conduct amounted only to a representation of law and that such a representation does not give rise to an estoppel. He said that Mr. Lyle-Meller knew all the facts quite well. He knew the nature of the Silver Match lighter, he knew how it was made and the mechanism of it. If the defendants made any representation to the effect that it "embodied his inventions" that was a representation as to the true interpretation of the contract, and of the patent applications, which was a matter of law and gave rise to no estoppel.

I do not think it necessary to go into these refinements about law and fact. I am clearly of opinion that this assurance was binding, no matter whether it is regarded as a representation of law or of facts or a mixture of both, and no matter whether it concerns the present or the future. It may not be such as to give rise to an estoppel at common law, strictly so called, for that was confined to representations of existing fact: but we have got far beyond the old common law estoppel now. We have reached a new estoppel which affects legal relations.

This new estoppel applies to representations as to the future. Take the kind of assurance which was held binding in Central London Property Trust v. High Trees House Ltd.[1] and in Tool Metal Manufacturing Co. Ltd. v. Tungsten Electric Co. Ltd. in the Court of Appeal (first action),[2] and in the House of Lords (second action).[3] In each of those cases a creditor during the war gave a promise or assurance to the other party that he would for the time being forgo sums which were thereafter to become due to him. In the High Trees [1] case it was rent. In the Tungsten case [3] it was sums payable by way of compensation. The assurance was not a contract binding in law, but it was an assurance as to the future, it was intended to be acted upon, it was acted upon, and it was held binding on the party who gave it. This appears distinctly from the speech of Lord Cohen.[4] The creditor was not allowed to resume his right to the periodic payments until he made it clear (as he did after the war) that he wanted them again, and then he only regained his right to them for the future, not for the past. He had forgone the past sums beyond recall.

DENNING L.J.

This new estoppel also applies to representations about legal relations. Take the kind of assertion or assurance which was held binding in Robertson v. Minister of Pensions,[5] and in the decision of the Privy Council in Harnham Singh v. Jamal Pirbhai[6] to which Lord Hailsham drew our attention this morning. In each of those cases one party had made to the other a clear and explicit assertion of the legal relationship existing between them. In the Robertson case[5] it was a statement by the Crown to an Army officer: "Your disability has been accepted as attributable "to military service." In the Harnham case[6] it was an unequivocal statement by a tenant that he "will remain in occupation "as a statutory tenant." The statement was not in either case a contract, and not regarded as such, but it was an assurance as to the legal position—as to the legal consequences of the facts known to both—which was intended to be acted upon, it was acted upon, and it was held to be binding. It did not give rise to a cause of action in itself, but it did prevent the party making it from setting up a defence which would otherwise be open to him. In that sense it gave rise to an estoppel, but it was not the old kind of estoppel, which was only a rule of evidence. It was the new kind of estoppel which affects legal relations.

I am unwilling to regard the present case as an old common law estoppel, for the simple reason that I doubt whether there was an estoppel as to the precise number of lighters made. If the defendants, after rendering their accounts, found out that they had made an arithmetical mistake and had stated the figure at 100 lighters too many, I should have though they should be allowed to correct the mistake. But no such mistake is suggested: and figures apart, I think the whole course of conduct by them amounted to a clear assurance that the lighters and refills which they were making did, within the meaning of the agreement, "embody the inventions" and that they were liable to pay royalties thereon. Mr. Lyle-Meller acted on that assurance, he altered his position on the faith of it, and it is binding on the manufacturers. They cannot now be allowed to go back on it, at any rate not in respect of past lighters and refills on which they have acknowledged the royalties are payable, and that is all we are concerned with here.

I think that the judge was right on both points and would dismiss the appeal.

HODSON L.J. In my opinion the judge was right on both points in this appeal, that is to say, on the construction of the agreement of December 24, 1952, and on the estoppel point, to which I shall refer.

The claim was for royalties upon articles sold by the defendants, and was based on an agreement whereby the plaintiff had agreed to grant the defendants the right to exploit certain of his inventions. The defendants had contended that, on the true construction of the agreement, no royalties were payable at all, and that none will be payable until the plaintiff has actually been granted letters patent in respect of his inventions. They have also contended that no royalties are payable because the articles they have sold do not fall within the claims of any of the applications put forward by the plaintiff, and so are outside the scope of the agreement because they do not embody the inventions, the subject of the agreement. To this the plaintiff has replied (and I shall have to refer to the pleading later for the way in which the matter is put) that the defendants are estopped from giving evidence to prove that the articles did not embody the inventions by reason of their conduct.

As to the construction of the agreement, it was drawn by skilled hands, and no doubt care was taken that it should carry out the intention of the parties. But in one respect at any rate —that is to say, in respect of clause 6 (a)—scope for argument has been left as to what the particular clause means. The judge has come to a conclusion as to the true effect of that particular clause, and that contention has been supported in this court by the respondent. For my part I am not prepared to accept the construction which the judge has placed upon that clause in full, although I do see the force of the argument that is put forward. The last phrase in the clause reads "so long as "such inventions as may be embodied shall be protected by "currently valid letters patent in the United Kingdom." Those words attach themselves more readily to the preceding phrase than the terms contained at the beginning of the clause: "The "licensee shall during the continuance of this agreement . . . "pay to the patentee the following royalties"—that is to say, I think that the phrase beginning "so long as," although awkwardly placed in any event, may more conveniently and sensibly attach to the protection provisions than to the payment provisions of that clause. I merely enter a caveat because I am not sure that, even when the words attach themselves to the protection part of the clause, they have the meaning which the judge thought that they had.

The appellants have contended that the words "so long as "such inventions as may be embodied shall be protected by "currently valid letters patent in the United Kingdom," attaching themselves to the words dealing with the payment of royalties, enable them to say that no royalties are payable until there are patents. This is flying in the face of the whole tenor of the document, an agreement which contains eighteen clauses, most of which are, in my judgment, specifically dealing with the interim period before letters patent had been granted. The phrase "during the continuance of this agreement" appears frequently from time to time throughout the document; and

LYLE-MELLER v. A. LEWIS & Co. (WESTMINSTER) LTD.
Hodson L.J.

when one follows up the words of each clause one finds that the parties are dealing with what is to be done during the continuance of this agreement—that is to say, from the date thereof—notwithstanding the fact that at the date thereof no letters patent had been granted although it was contemplated that letters patent would be granted, and applications had been put in containing specifications of the articles concerned.

On this question of construction, I am content to base my judgment on the overriding words of clause 4 (b) of the agreement. In order to understand clause 4 (b) I think it is necessary to read 4 (a), which is in these terms: "Forthwith upon the "grant of letters patent upon each of the said applications the "patentee shall grant to the licensee and the licensee shall "accept a sole and exclusive licence with power to grant sub-"licences under such letters patent for the full term thereof "and any prolongation or extension thereof in the terms set forth "in the second schedule hereto or as nearly conforming thereto "as the circumstances and the laws and practice of the respec-"tive countries in which such letters patent have been granted "will permit." Then follows 4 (b), which is the vital subparagraph: "Pending the grant of such licences the licensee "shall be entitled to use and exercise the said inventions and to "make and sell gas lighters and gas refills in such manner and "on such terms as are hereinafter provided as if such licences "had in fact been granted." The subparagraph which I have just read can to my mind mean one thing, and one thing only; the words "on such terms as hereinafter provided" refer forward to clause 6 (a) so as to bring in the liability to pay the royalties as if the licences had in fact been granted. The words used are not apt, in my judgment, to cover the contention of the appellants, which is that all that is intended by this clause was to deal with back royalties; that is to say, they admit that when the letters patent have been granted, the back royalties (or provisions for back payments by way of royalties) would be due to the plaintiff under this clause. But the sensible reading of this subclause seems to me that which the judge accepted and which has been defended in this court; that pending the grant of licences which follow upon the grant of letters patent—which themselves follow and are assumed to be based upon the applications which are scheduled to the agreement—the licensee shall be entitled to use the inventions "on such terms as are herein-"after provided as if the licences had in fact been granted." When one looks at the terms of clause 6 (a) one finds that royalties were to be payable when the patent has been granted and when the licence has been issued, and all that one has to do is to return to 4 (b) and read 4 (b) and to see what payments are to be made by taking the figures from clause 6 (a).

That is indeed what the defendants did. They did not read the words "as if such licences had in fact been granted" as equivalent to "not until they have been granted." Throughout the period until December, 1954—a period of two years—they acted upon the basis that royalties were payable as if licences had been granted following letters patent; and it was only after that date that they changed their attitude towards the plaintiff, and these proceedings for payment of royalties followed.

I come now to the question of estoppel. That was raised only in reply, after the defendants had specifically pleaded by amendment that royalties were not payable by them in respect of lighters and refills sold by them which were not protected by the claims. It is pleaded in this way: "If the plaintiff should "contend (contrary to the defendants' submission) that royalties "are payable by the defendants in respect of lighters and refills "sold by them which were not protected by the claims of any "granted patent or patents but which embody the inventions of "the complete specifications"—of which the numbers are given —"as published, then the defendants will contend that no "royalties are payable by them because (i) they have not sold "any lighters or refills falling within any claim of any of the "said specifications as published on their true construction." In reply to the amended pleading of the defendants, the plaintiff by amendment pleaded inter alia as follows: "By reason of the "payment by the defendants to the plaintiff of all royalties "payable by the defendants under the said agreement during "the period from the commencement of the said agreement until "March 31, 1954, the defendants induced the plaintiff to believe "that they admitted that the lighters and refills manufactured "and sold by them embodied the inventions the subject of the "said agreement or some of them and that the defendants would "continue to pay royalties thereon. Acting on such belief the "plaintiff did not determine the said agreement, or, alternatively, "seek to grant licences to other manufacturers, on the ground "that the minimum royalties reserved by clause 8 (a) thereof "had not been paid, as he would otherwise have done, but "maintained the said agreement," and so on.

The position then was that the defendants were seeking to prove that the articles which they manufactured did not embody the inventions the subject of the agreement, and it was in connexion with that that the question of estoppel arose. The plaintiff objected to the calling of that evidence and said that the defendants were estopped from so doing by reason of the representations which they had made by their conduct throughout the currency of the agreement in paying the royalties on the footing that they were bound to do so. That, to my mind, as pleaded and as found by the judge, was an estoppel of the kind which is well recognized at common law. I think that as pleaded and as found the estoppel is perfectly sound.

Bowen L.J., in Low v. Bouverie,[7] said: "Estoppel is only "a rule of evidence; you cannot found an action upon estoppel.

1955
LYLE-MELLER v. A. LEWIS & CO. (WESTMINSTER) LTD.
Hodson L.J.

"Estoppel is only important as being one step in the progress "towards relief on the hypothesis that the defendant is estopped "from denying the truth of something which he has said." Later he said[8]: "an estoppel, that is to say, the language "upon which the estoppel is founded, must be precise and "unambiguous. That does not necessarily mean that the "language must be such that it cannot possibly be open to "different constructions, but that it must be such as will be "reasonably understood in a particular sense by the person to "whom it is addressed."

It seems to me that in this case the representations by conduct, which the defendants made, were perfectly clear and unambiguous, and were representations of fact, namely, that the articles which they made embodied the inventions which covered the subject-matter of the agreement. That, to my mind, is a representation of fact. It matters not that questions of law may be involved and that it may be necessary to construe the agreement in order to find out whether there is an embodiment. That there may be a mixed question of law and fact does not destroy the estoppel. Nor does it matter that questions of patent law may be involved in considering whether or not there is an invention which is covered by a patent. But that there was fact in this case which was relevant appears perfectly clear from the course which the trial took when the estoppel point was taken, because the defendants were then seeking to call evidence to show that the article which they manufactured did not embody the plaintiff's inventions which were covered by the agreement. To my mind there was no question of having to carry the doctrine of estoppel beyond what I might perhaps describe as the ancient field which was being considered by Bowen L.J. in the case to which I have referred.

The only other case to which I need make passing reference is the decision of the House of Lords in Greenwood v. Martin's Bank,[9] where Lord Tomlin spoke on this subject in the passage which the judge cited. I will not repeat what he said, but I agree with the judge in taking the view that, following upon the instruction to be obtained from that speech, the plaintiff had satisfied all that it was necessary for him to do in the way of establishing an estoppel. There was a representation or conduct amounting to a representation which was intended to induce a course of conduct on the part of the person to whom the representation is made—those last words are a citation from Lord Tomlin's speech—and finally there was a detriment to such person as the consequence of the act. Here there is no doubt (and Sir Lionel Heald has not argued to the contrary) that if there was a representation creating an estoppel, the plaintiff did alter his position by holding to the agreement and by not looking round for fresh licensees.

the representation was simply a representation of law or one of fact, or mixed fact and law. If the representation had been a mere representation of law, I should find it difficult to get an estoppel out of it. There are, indeed, passages in various authorities to the effect that if you merely admit liability and say you are wrong in law, no estoppel arises. There may be an agreement for consideration which produces the same result, but in the absence of agreement the mere admission of liability standing by itself does not as a rule produce anything in the nature of an estoppel on the authorities because—as I think Lloyd-Jacob J. put it—it may be taken to be reasonable that each party is in as good a position as the other to satisfy himself on what the law is; and if one party admits he is wrong in law, he is not necessarily estopped from changing his mind hereafter.

Some support for what I have just been saying is to be found in the decision of this court in Birch v. Pease and Partners Ltd.[10] That was a case where there was an admission of liability, but the case was decided on an agreement; that appears I think quite clearly from the judgments of Scott and Goddard L.JJ. Goddard L.J. drew attention to the consideration for the agreement which existed in that case.[11]

Here I see no difficulty at all in supporting the judgment on this ground as on the other ground, and I would accordingly dismiss the appeal.

MORRIS L.J. The claim that was presented in this action was for a sum of money representing royalties which it was said were due under the terms of the agreement of December 24, 1952. The defendants previously admitted that they owed the sums claimed. With their letter of December 23, 1954, they sent a detailed statement which they said was in respect of royalties paid and payable up to November 30, 1954. They never paid, and so the action was brought.

By their defence as originally drafted the principal point that the defendants took was a point that they said arose by reason of clause 6 (a) of the agreement. The concluding words of clause 6 (a), to which I must later refer, are "so long as such "inventions as may be embodied shall be protected by currently "valid letters patent in the United Kingdom." The defendants, in reliance on those words, pleaded that there had at no time been any currently valid letters patent, or any letters patent at all, subsisting in the United Kingdom; and so they said, by paragraph 4 of their defence: "No royalties are or have ever "been payable by the defendants under the agreement." They also counterclaimed for a sum of nearly £7,000, that sum being the amount of royalties that they had paid to the plaintiff. At some stage, that counterclaim was abandoned.

LYLE-MELLER v. A. LEWIS & CO. (WESTMINSTER) LTD.
Morris L.J.

The matter came before Lloyd-Jacob J., who gave a preliminary judgment dealing with the construction of the agreement. After that preliminary judgment there was a further hearing, and in the meantime the defence was amended. By the amended defence, the defendants said, in effect, that they had not sold any lighters or refills falling within any claim of any specification referred to in the agreement. They also pleaded certain points as to amount, about which we have heard nothing. The amended reply to that amended defence raised the question of estoppel.

It seems to me that it is logical to approach the matter by considering first of all certain questions on the construction of the agreement, and in particular to consider whether the point taken by the defendants is a valid point or not. Shortly stated, it is that nothing was payable under the agreement until there were inventions that were protected by currently valid letters patent in the United Kingdom.

It is necessary to refer to some of the clauses of the agreement in order to test and examine this main submission which the defendants advanced. The first recital to the agreement was that the patentee had made certain inventions. The defendants were, therefore, by that recital to their agreement, acknowledging that the plaintiff had made certain inventions, and it is only reasonable to suppose that the defendants knew what those inventions were. They certainly had every opportunity to know. The third recital shows that the right that was granted by the patentee, the plaintiff, was a right to exploit the inventions and that it was a right to exploit them throughout the world on the terms of the agreement.

It seems to me that there are many indications in the agreement which support the view that not only was the agreement at once operative—for I think that is abundantly clear—but that it was to be at once operative so far as the payment of royalties was concerned.

[His Lordship considered the construction of a number of clauses in the agreement, and continued:] The result was that the defendants were entitled to use and exercise the inventions, and were entitled to make and sell gas lighters and gas refills on the terms of the agreement, and as if licences had in fact been granted. That being so, it seems to me that the plaintiff was entitled to royalties if he proved the facts of his case.

The plaintiff accordingly had to prove his case and establish his facts. He had to show that articles had been sold which had embodied the invention. He would get 6d. for every gas lighter embodying his inventions, or any of them, and he would get 2d. for every gas refill embodying his inventions, or any of them. But the plaintiff might not in the ordinary course know how many lighters and refills had been sold. So the agreement provided for that matter. Under clause 6 (b) there was an obligation to send a full statement as to the manner in which the royalties were calculated. Such statement would include a statement as to the number of the articles sold. Furthermore, there was the obligation in clause 7 of the agreement to keep proper books, which were to be subject to inspection.

The defendants in the first place made a very clear admission of the amount that was payable by them. They had in a letter of November 30 written as follows: "We are enclosing a state-"ment which we have today received showing the royalties due "for the six months ended September 30, 1954." With their December letter, they sent a statement showing what had happened in the past and the amount then payable. That statement showed that the defendants had recorded the numbers of lighters sold and the numbers of refills sold. The defendants had first paid the £1,000 on account for which the agreement provided: they had sent a cheque on June 23, 1953: another one on October 28, 1953: a further cheque on the same date: another cheque on June 11, 1954: and another cheque on that same date. The statement recorded the number of lighters and refills sold in the eight months to November 30. I do not gather that there is any withdrawal by the defendants in regard to the number of the articles they had sold.

It is at this stage that the plaintiff refers to what was done in the past. There was much discussion by counsel as to the results of conduct which induces a belief that rights will not be exercised. The position in such a case may be governed by the principle of equity expressed in Hughes v. Metropolitan Railway Co.[12] and described by Bowen L.J. in Birmingham and District Land Co. v. London and North Western Railway Co.[13] Bowen L.J. said: "if persons who have contractual rights against others "induce by their conduct those against whom they have such "rights to believe that such rights will either not be enforced "or will be kept in suspense or abeyance for some particular "time, those persons will not be allowed by a court of equity "to enforce the rights until such time has elapsed, without at "all events placing the parties in the same position as they were "before." But here we are not concerned with any situation where on equitable principles there is to be a disallowance of rights. It seems to me that here the plaintiff is enforcing his rights, and in doing so he is using the principle of estoppel to prove his case.

What was said in Low v. Bouverie[14] is of direct application to the facts of this case. Bowen L.J. said: "Estoppel is only "a rule of evidence; you cannot found an action upon estoppel. "Estoppel is only important as being one step in the progress "towards relief on the hypothesis that the defendant is estopped "from denying the truth of something which he has said."

Reference has been made to the words of Lord Tomlin in the Greenwood case.[15] In Maclaine v. Gatty,[16] Lord Birkenhead said [17]: "Where A has by his words or conduct justified B in "believing that a certain state of facts exists, and B has acted "upon such belief to his prejudice, A is not permitted to affirm "against B that a different state of facts existed at the same "time. Whether one reads the case of Pickard v. Sears,[18] or "the later classic authorities which have illustrated this topic, "one will not, I think, greatly vary or extend this simple "definition of the doctrine."

In my judgment, that applies to the facts of this case. The claim here is for money due down to November 30, 1954. The plaintiff says: "You have sold 116,000 lighters and 506,000 "refills which embody my inventions. You at all times down "to the end of 1954, either expressly or impliedly, stated that "you had used and were using my inventions. You told me the "numbers of the lighters and the refills which you had made "which embodied my inventions, and you paid me on that basis." I think, therefore, that the plaintiff can say that the defendants, by words and conduct, made the representation that their lighters and refills embodied his (the plaintiff's) inventions. Secondly, I think that he can say that it was made in such a way that he acted upon it. Thirdly, I think that the plaintiff can say that he acted on it to his detriment, because he refrained from seeking another licensee and he refrained from exploiting his invention.

The judge was satisfied in regard to the issues of fact. He said [19]: "I have heard Mr. Lyle-Meller in the witness box, and "he has told me that had he any reason to suppose that the "obligation of the defendants as a consequence of this licence "was to cause them to manufacture and distribute lighters and "refills upon which no royalty was payable, he would have "desired to exploit his inventions by seeking another licensee "or other licensees. Indeed, the agreement contains provision "whereby if the royalties payable under it do not reach the "specified amount he is to have freedom so to exploit his inven-"tion. I see no reason whatever to doubt the evidence he "gave, which I accept as evidence of truth, that having regard "to the payment of royalties by the defendants in respect of this "agreement he refrained from seeking alternative methods of "exploiting his invention and that, if it were now held that in "so doing he had rendered himself unable to procure any "remuneration from the exploitation of his invention, that would "plainly amount to a detriment to him." I think that the way in which the judge approached the matter as illustrated by that passage was entirely correct.

The plaintiff can, therefore, say that this rule of estoppel prevents the defendants from asserting that the articles which they sold did not embody the plaintiff's inventions. It seems to me that the defendants were themselves in the best position to know. It was really a question of fact. Had the case had to proceed further before the judge the admission of liability, though later retracted, might have had some evidential value. But it seems to me that in common fairness, which lies at the root of the application of the principle of estoppel, the defendants ought not in this case to be heard to say that the articles which they sold, the numbers of which they presumably still admit, did not embody the plaintiff's inventions. I would dismiss the appeal.

Landlord and Tenant—Repairs—Covenant—Breach—Notice—Covenant to keep structure in repair — Breach existing at date of lease — Implied condition of notice of want of repair.

Landlords covenanted to keep in good tenantable repair the roof, main structure and outside walls of a shop leased to the plaintiffs in February, 1953, for a term of five years. In June, 1953, the plaintiffs themselves carried out limited repairs to make safe the floorboards of a store room on the ground floor at the request of the local authority. On November 10, 1953, while the shop manager was standing on this floor it gave way and he was precipitated therefrom into the basement whereby he sustained serious injuries for which he was compensated by the plaintiffs. No notice of want of repair had been given to the landlords. In an action by the plaintiffs for breach of covenant in which they claimed an indemnity from the landlords to cover the compensation and the costs which they had paid to the shop manager:—

Held, that although the landlords' covenant to keep in repair included a duty to repair any defect that existed when the premises were let, such obligation did not arise until they had notice thereof; and that as the landlords had not been given notice of the defect and the plaintiffs had not proved that they had actual knowledge of it, they were not in breach of their covenant.

Quaere whether the landlords would have been liable if they had had actual knowledge at the time of letting.

ACTION.

The following statement of facts is taken substantially from the judgment. By a lease dated February 5, 1953, the defendant company let to the plaintiff company a shop and premises at 244, Regent Road, Salford, for a term of five years. The lessor covenanted to keep the roof, main structure and outside walls of the demised premises, except the glass windows thereof but including boundary walls, in good and tenantable repair.

Before the lease was entered into there had been the usual negotiations between the parties, and the plaintiffs' representatives had inspected the premises to see if they would be suitable. A day or two after February 5 the plaintiffs entered into possession for the purpose of putting some fittings, including new shop windows, into the premises. When the fittings had been arranged to their satisfaction they took in their stock-in-trade, and on March 29 opened their business.

On the ground floor towards the back of the shop there was a small room, described as a store room, in the centre of which there was on the floor a metal plate which had apparently been put there by way of repairing some damage or defect in the floorboards. An inspector of the local authority had advised or required that this plate should be removed and the floorboards properly repaired, and in June the plaintiffs—although they might have called upon the defendants, their lessors under the lease to do so—employed a builder to take up the metal plate and insert portions of new floorboards to repair the hole. This was done and business continued.

On November 10, 1953, Mr. Morehen, the manager of the shop on behalf of the plaintiffs, stood on the floor of the little store room which collapsed under him, causing him to fall and suffer injuries. The cause of the floor's collapse was discovered by an architect and surveyor who examined the fall of the floor a week or two after the accident. He discovered that the joists of the floor were all very badly affected by dry rot at the point where they entered the walls, and he was surprised, having regard to the advanced state of decay of the joists at those points, that the floor had stayed up as long as it had. He observed that, while there was no sign that anything had ever been done to support the floor of this small store room, in other parts of the basement props had been placed under the ground floor with what were called padstones—that is to say, pads of timber—between the top of the posts and the bottom of the joists. These props had obviously been in position for a long time, because many of the pads of timber at the top of the posts were themselves in a rotten state.

The plaintiffs were advised that there was a legal liability upon them to compensate Mr. Morehen for his injuries, and his claim was compromised by a payment of £2,000 and 50 guineas costs, amounting to £2,052 10s. in all.

The plaintiffs alleged that the defendants, as lessors, were in breach of their covenant to keep the main structure of the premises in good and tenantable repair, and that by reason of their failure to do so the plaintiffs had been called upon to pay damages and costs to their manager; and they sought to recover from the defendants the amount of such damages and costs.

GLYN-JONES J. I am grateful to counsel for the help they have given me in this case, which raises a point in the law of landlord and tenant upon which there appears to be no precise and binding authority. [His Lordship stated the facts, and continued:] The plaintiff company say that the defendant company, as lessors, are in breach of the obligation put upon the company by the covenant in the lease to keep the main structure in good and tenantable repair. Unquestionably, the joists of the floor are part of the main structure and the covenant applies to them. Looking at the language of the covenant and no further for the moment, Mr. Atkinson, for the plaintiffs, says that the lessors had covenanted to keep these joists and the floor which rested upon them in good and tenantable repair, that they were not in good and tenantable repair and that that is why the accident happened and why the plaintiffs have been called upon to pay out this sum in damages, and that the plaintiffs should recover from the lessors the amount of damages and costs which have been paid to Mr. Morehen.

A number of issues are raised in the pleadings, but only one, or perhaps two, are before me. It was very rightly conceded by Mr. Laski, for the lessors, that the plaintiffs were under a legal liability to compensate Mr. Morehen, that the compensation paid was reasonable and that the loss suffered by the plaintiffs in having to pay that compensation is a consequence of the breach by the lessors of this covenant, assuming that there has been any breach. There was at one time a suggestion that this floor fell because it was overloaded by the plaintiffs, but that suggestion was withdrawn before the hearing began.

The question for me, then, is whether or not the lessors are in breach of the covenant. As I have said, Mr. Atkinson's argument is that on the face of the covenant it is quite obvious that the lessors covenanted to keep the floor in good and tenantable repair, that it was not in good and tenantable repair and that therefore there is a breach. Now to that Mr. Laski replies that for a very long time—certainly since Makin v. Watkinson [1]—there has had to be read into a covenant by a lessor to keep premises in repair an implied condition that the lessor shall have notice of the want of repair before he can be called upon, under the covenant, to make it good.

Mr. Laski, I think, goes so far as to argue that every covenant by a landlord to keep the demised premises in repair must be read as if there were imported into it in unqualified terms an absolute provision that the landlord's obligation is not to have effect unless and until notice has been given to him by the tenant of the defect. This, I think, goes too far.

I bear in mind what was said in the speeches in the House of Lords in Murphy v. Hurly [2] to this effect: that the reason for the condition that the landlord must not be held liable unless he has had notice is that, since he is out of possession of the premises and the tenant is in possession of them, it would be wholly unreasonable, and indeed unrealistic, to hold the landlord liable for not having effected repairs if he did not know and could not know that the repairs needed doing. Certainly Lord Buckmaster and Lord Sumner, in their speeches in Murphy v. Hurly,[2] indicate that the principle laid down in Makin v. Watkinson [3] is not an absolute and unvarying rule such that every covenant by a landlord must be qualified by a proviso that he is not obliged to repair unless and until he has had notice from the tenant of the want of repair.

Lord Buckmaster, for instance said [4]: "The principle upon "which notice is required to be given to a lessor requiring him "to repair demised premises in accordance with his covenant "before proceedings are taken to obtain damages for the breach "is not inherent in the relationship between landlord and tenant. "The doctrine depends upon the actual facts existing in each "case and upon the consideration whether the circumstances "are such that knowledge of what may be required to be done

" to comply with the covenant cannot reasonably be supposed to " be possessed by one party while it is by the other." Lord Sumner said [5]: " The rule requiring a notice of want of repair " by the tenant to the landlord, in the case of an ordinary land- " lord's repairing covenant for dwelling-houses, warehouses and " similar structures, is well settled, and no-one proposes to alter " or restrict it. The nature and conditions of this rule are, how- " ever, equally well settled. As a rule of construction it reads " into the covenant words—namely, ' upon notice '—which are " not there, its application naturally depends on the existence of " those strong circumstances, of necessity, which alone justify the " implication of a condition upon an obligation, which is itself " expressed unconditionally."

What Mr. Atkinson says to me on that is that, in respect of defects which existed at the time when the term began, the facts which, as a general rule, render necessary the implication into the landlord's covenant of a provision that notice of the defect must be given to him do not exist, because the landlord was in a perfectly good position to know what the state of the premises was at the time when the letting took place and if, being in a position to know, he chooses to covenant that he will keep the place in repair, he is bound by his covenant and there need not be imported into the covenant any condition requiring notice to be given to him if the defect is one which was in existence when the lease began. I suppose, although Mr. Atkinson did not put it exactly in this way, that he would argue that since the landlord at the time of letting is in a position to know, if he chooses to make the necessary inquiry, what defects are present, then, if he wants to exclude liability in respect of them there would be nothing to prevent his framing his covenant so as to exclude his liability to repair such defects either without notice or at all. That, I think, is the way in which Mr. Atkinson puts his argument.

I have, perhaps, begged the question whether or not a landlord is liable to put right, under a covenant to keep in repair, defects which existed at the time of the letting, which is sometimes expressed as being an obligation not only to keep in repair but also to put into repair. It is, of course, well settled, as is shown by the many cases which have been cited to me, that where a landlord undertakes to keep premises in repair he may not, when a notice is given to him of a defect, say: " That defect " existed at the time when I let the premises. If you make me " repair that, you will, in effect, be making me put the premises " into repair and I have not covenanted to do so." If he has covenanted to keep premises in repair and notice is given to him of a defect, he is bound as a rule to repair that defect, whether it existed at the time of the original demise or has come since into existence.

Glyn-Jones J.

That, in my opinion, is the sense in which a covenant by a landlord to keep in repair may be said to be a covenant to put into repair, and I reject Mr. Atkinson's argument that, merely because a covenant to keep in repair has been construed as requiring the landlord to put the premises into repair, in the sense that he is as well liable to repair defects which existed at the beginning of the lease as defects which have subsequently come into existence, the obligation to put the premises into repair by curing any defect existing at the start of the term rests upon the landlord at the moment the term begins to run, whether he has notice of the existence of the defect or not and even whether the defect is apparent or concealed. This means, I think, that Mr. Atkinson fails in his main contention. I am of opinion that, whether the defect existed at the beginning of the tenancy or not, the obligation of the lessors to repair it did not come into existence until they had notice, and it is conceded that no express notice of this defect was ever given to the lessors.

A second issue arose in the present case, namely, whether or not the lessors actually knew of this defect at the time of the letting. When first the suggestion was made by Mr. Atkinson that I ought to find that the lessors know of the defect, Mr. Laski objected—rightly, in my view—that there was no plea, of actual knowledge of the defect by the lessors, on the pleadings. I therefore gave Mr. Atkinson leave to deliver a reply, in which he answered the lessors' defence that they had had no notice by alleging, in effect, that they had actual knowledge. Mr. Atkinson—again, as I think, quite rightly—conceded that it was not enough for him to show, for this purpose, that the landlord had the means of knowledge, but that nothing short of actual knowledge would take the place of notice. I do not think that anything short of proof by the tenant of actual knowledge by the landlord can relieve him of the necessity of proving that he gave notice to the landlord before he can hold the landlord liable for breach of the covenant to repair. Having allowed witnesses for the plaintiffs to be recalled and cross-examined by Mr. Laski, and having heard Mr. Rose, a witness called by Mr. Laski, I have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that Mr. Atkinson has failed to establish actual knowledge by the lessors of the state of these joists.

Whether or not, in an action for negligence brought by some person who had been injured as a result of the collapse of this floor, either against the lessors at the time when they occupied, or against the lessees at the time when the lessees occupied, the plaintiff would have succeeded in proving that the state of the floors ought to have been known to the occupier is another matter. If I had had that question to decide, I might have had no difficulty in deciding it, but, as between lessors and lessees, I can see no reason why I should assume that the lessors let this building with knowledge of the defect, any more than I should assume that the lessees took it with knowledge of the defect. Neither of them, in my view, took the slightest trouble to find out whether or not the floor of this comparatively old building was in such a state that it was safe to store furniture on it. However, to say that both of them failed to make the inquiry which, perhaps, they should have made, is not to say that either of them had actual knowledge of the defect, which any sort of proper examination would have revealed.

[His Lordship referred to the evidence, and continued:] Since I am not satisfied that Mr. Atkinson has proved actual knowledge, it becomes unnecessary for me to consider what my decision in this case would have been had actual knowledge been established.

Judicial Precedent—Damages—Guidance from awards in previous cases—Personal injuries—Whether counsel should cite amounts awarded in other cases where similar injuries sustained—Judges' discretion.

The plaintiff sustained a serious accident which resulted in the lower half of his body becoming paralysed. At the hearing of his claim for damages for personal injuries his counsel proposed to refer to previous decided cases to show the amounts which had been awarded by other judges in similar cases. Counsel for the defendants objected:—

Held, that, although a judge is not bound to hear reference to such cases, he may do so. He has a discretion to decide whether in his view the reference to such other cases would or would not assist him.

Per Parker L.J. I think that counsel can be trusted only to refer to other cases very sparingly, bearing in mind that each case depends upon its own facts and only rarely can another case be of real assistance to the judge.

admitted liability for the accident, but contested the amount of damages. Counsel for the plaintiff asked that he might be allowed to refer the judge to decisions of other judges and of the Court of Appeal in cases of a like nature, but Lloyd-Jacob J. treated the request as a preliminary issue, and held that it would not be right for him to permit any reference to the quantum of damages awarded in similar cases. He awarded the plaintiff £12,875 damages, which included £60 agreed special damages. The plaintiff appealed.

The following cases were cited in argument: Rushton v. National Coal Board [1]; Roe v. Ministry of Health [2]; Davies v. Fraser and Chalmers Engineering Works [3]; Smith v. Alexander Findlay & Co. [4]; Benham v. Gambling [5]; Bird v. Cocking & Sons [6]; Bailey v. Howard. [7]

SINGLETON L.J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff, Peter Leslie Waldon, who was very badly injured on August 18, 1954. He was a passenger in a motor-car; a War Office lorry and trailer sought to pass the car in which he was and an accident took place. The plaintiff brought this action against the War Office, who accepted responsibility for the accident, and the only question which had to be determined was the amount of damages to which the plaintiff was entitled.

That is often an extraordinarily difficult question. The desire of the judge of first instance is to do what is right and fair between the parties so that a person who is injured may have the right sum of damages, in so far as damages can compensate for an accident of a serious character.

At the time of the accident the plaintiff was 28 years old. He had been apprenticed in his youth to a firm of engineers with whom he had remained until he was 17 years old. Thereafter he spent four years in the Navy. He returned from the Navy and worked again as an engineer repairing, mostly, Government instruments. He was with the firm for about five years and then he obtained employment with R. Hoe & Crabtree, Ltd., engineers, and at the time of the accident he was earning £9 15s. a week. He had very bright prospects. A director of the company described him as "one of the bright young men employed "by the company" he said that he had a very considerable chance of a rise very shortly to 10 guineas a week. Indeed, he had even better prospects than that, for it was pointed out that in that company the directors had all started in the same sort of way that the plaintiff had done, and although it was not said that he would become a director, there were possibilities in his employment to which any young man might look forward. A director is paid a considerable sum of money. Apart from that, I should judge that there was every prospect of considerable increase in the plaintiff's earnings in years to come.

He met with this accident which resulted in paralysis of the lower half of his body. There was an injury to the spine. A description of the injuries contained in the statement of claim is amply borne out by the evidence. "Fracture (dislocation) of the "12th dorsal vertebra resulting in a total transverse spinal syn-"drome below the 8th thoracic segment. Total paralysis of both "lower limbs. Total paralysis of lower abdominal muscles. Total "loss of sensation below the 8th thoracic segment. Total "paralysis of bladder and bowels."

The result is that the plaintiff is unable to walk; he has to be helped by his wife in almost everything except that he has the use of his hands and arms. Over and above that, he has suffered great pain, and it appears from the evidence given that the pain will persist. He and his wife have one son who is quite young. They were looking forward to at least one more child. That has become impossible by reason of the condition of the plaintiff, and indeed the whole life of the plaintiff is changed. He will never be able to work again. He is trying to do something with his hands in the way of clock repairing. Whether he will earn anything by that I should think it doubtful, but I will assume that he may earn something. He had a serious chest affection for some time, but that improved under treatment. None the less, he is just a wreck who can do nothing for himself.

It is impossible in such a case for anyone to say what is the right sum to award as damages. But the effort has to be made. The case came before Lloyd-Jacob J. on July 25, 1955, and the judge awarded the plaintiff the sum of £12,875. The appeal of the plaintiff is directed to showing that, on the facts, the amount is too small, and this court is asked to allow the appeal and to increase the amount of damages payable to the plaintiff.

The court does not readily allow an appeal from a judge of first instance on a question of damages for reasons which are well known; but if it be shown that the judge has made some mistake as to the position in law, or if he has made a wholly erroneous estimate of damages, the court can interfere.

One point of law is raised. Mr. Gerald Gardiner, appearing for the plaintiff before Lloyd-Jacob J., raised a question of some interest. He asked that he might be allowed to refer the judge to decisions of other judges and of this court in cases of a like nature in order to give some guidance as to the amount of damages which should be awarded. Mr. Rodger Winn, appearing for the defendants, objected to any such material being placed before the judge, and the judge, who dealt with the question as a preliminary issue, gave judgment upon that question. He said that Mr. Gardiner had referred him to the decision of this court in Rushton v. National Coal Board,[1] and in particular to certain words of Birkett L.J. Lloyd-Jacob J. said: "As I understand "the language, it is in main directed to a consideration of those "cases in the Court of Appeal, and, indeed, the language of "Birkett L.J., in which he says 'when, therefore, a particular "'matter comes for review one of the questions is, how does this "'accord with the general run of assessments made over the "'years in comparable cases?', is to my mind apt to indicate "the practice in the Court of Appeal itself. I am disinclined to "accept the view that the Court of Appeal would impose upon "judges of first instance an additional burden to that which they "must necessarily bear in assessing compensation in this type of "case by requiring them to do other than considering such cases "as containing the principles upon which the assessments are "based." The judge's decision is in these words: "I do decide "that in the circumstances it would not be right for me to permit "Mr. Gardiner to refer to the quantum of damages awarded in "similar cases. If I am wrong about that, he will be able to get "the matter put right hereafter."

I am sure the judge appreciates that this court is always most anxious not to put any additional burden upon judges of first instance. They have quite enough to do. The decision of the Court of Appeal to which reference was made drew attention to the desirability of approaching, as far as possible, something in the nature of a standard in certain classes of injury so as to help judges of first instance as much as possible. No one knows what is the right sum of damages in any particular case, and no two cases are alike.

One of the cases to which Mr. Gardiner desired to direct the attention of the judge was a decision of Barry J. in a case of the same kind as this, a case of paraplegia, in which Barry J. had given £18,675 damages to a man 35 years old, and who was earning £12 10s. a week. There was an appeal in that case, and the Court of Appeal expressed the view that the damages were on the high side, but that the assessment did not err to such an extent that it was the duty of this court to interfere, and the appeal was dismissed. I think that reference to that case would have been of help to the judge. The circumstances were similar to those in this case, though they were not quite the same. There were two or three other cases to which Mr. Gardiner would have referred the judge if he had been allowed, but as objection was taken and the judge ruled against the plaintiff's submission, he had not the benefit of hearing any of those cases. I do not consider that a judge is bound to hear such evidence. If counsel on one side or the other tenders such evidence or such material, it is for the judge to say whether, in his discretion, he thinks it will be of help to him or not. He may know all the recent cases upon the subject, or most of them. He may not desire to complicate the issue, for it does mean some complication if that material is received. On the other hand, he may think that it would be of help to him.

The danger of such material is that it is apt to take the mind of the tribunal from the particular facts of the case on which it is to give a decision. It would not be right that a claim for damages for personal injuries should open by counsel for the plaintiff saying: "My Lord, I have here 15 decisions of "judges in the last five years upon an injury like this one," say, the loss of a leg; and for counsel on the other side to say: "I have 25 similar decisions," the one quoting the high ones and the other quoting the low ones. That would not be of help to any judge. But in this case there was an injury of a kind which is not common. There have been decisions upon it and one of them reached the Court of Appeal, and there is a judgment given by the Court of Appeal upon it. I am inclined to the view that it would have been of help to the judge, and if counsel on the one side desired the judge to look at the judgment he might well have done so. A judge in assessing damages draws upon his own experience. Where does he get that experience? From knowledge of other judges' decisions as to amount; from knowledge of what is said in this court and in the House of Lords; and from his ordinary experience in life. It would not be wrong for counsel appearing in such a case to say to a judge: "I have here the report of a decision in the Court of Appeal on "an appeal on damages in a case very like this one; and I have "another case, a decision of Mr. Justice 'X,' a case again "very like this one. Would your Lordship like to have them?" The judge could not be wrong if he said: "Yes, I should like that "information. I should like to know what the Court of Appeal "said and I should like to know how Mr. Justice 'X' dealt "with this subject, for it is one of which no one has great "experience."

The receiving of material of this kind by a judge ought to happen seldom. The question is one for the discretion of the judge, to be exercised sparingly, as I think. I would add this. All that I have said upon this subject is directed to the case of a judge sitting alone. It may be said: "Why should a judge "have something before him which a jury would not have?" And I am not sure that there is any good reason, except, perhaps, this. If jurors, new to the task, are called upon to assess damages in a case such as this, the more one can keep their minds directed to the actual issues the better. If numbers of other cases are mentioned in which damages have been given, the danger is confusion or complication, and I would not encourage that—and there is a danger of it—in a jury case. The judge realizes that his task is to assess damages in the particular case before him, and upon the evidence before him and upon nothing else. If he can get help from decisions of other judges, or from this court, I am inclined to think that in his discretion he might well accept it. It is for him to judge.

It was with that in view that the remarks of Birkett L.J. in Bird v. Cocking & Sons Ltd.,[2] which was cited in Rushton v. National Coal Board,[3] were used, and with the desire which everyone has had for years to get as near as one can towards some form of scale or regularity in assessing damages.

As to the facts of this case. There are three main points to be considered in the assessment of damages. One is the loss of earnings. The plaintiff was 28 years old when the accident happened and was earning just under £10 a week; his prospects of increased earnings were good, and he might have risen to a very much better position as time went on. He appeared to have a long working life before him until he was injured. The loss of earnings is cause for a considerable sum by way of damages.

The next, and a most important one, is the suffering which the plaintiff has undergone, and which he will undergo; and the loss of the "amenities of life." He cannot enjoy himself as he did before. He can do nothing. For a man of 28 to suffer that is indeed grievous.

Again, he has to have someone to look after him, and will so require all his days and all his nights, to tend to him and to do things he cannot do for himself. That is done by his wife now. She is young. He is not under the necessity of paying someone a large amount each week which would have to be paid if his wife did not do it. It ought not to be forgotten that his wife is doing it. She does not ask for payment, but her hands are tied when she is doing it, though I do not suggest that there should be a sum awarded which would cover the cost. I feel that one has to bear in mind that his wife is helping now and that, if by chance for one reason or another she ceased to help him, if she died or if she was ill through doing too much or from some other cause, he would need help. That is the third point which should be taken into consideration.

Apart entirely from the question of law which was raised, it appears to me that the court is confronted with this fact, that the damages awarded by the judge are too low for the injuries suffered. In my judgment, they are so much too low that it is the duty of this court to interfere, though nothing can compensate a man for injuries such as these. I would allow the appeal and increase the amount of damages to the sum of £17,000 in all.

JENKINS L.J. I agree, and although we are differing from the judge I find nothing that I can usefully add to what my Lord has said.

PARKER L.J. I also agree. In fitting the figure awarded by this court into any general pattern of awards in the case of paraplegia, I for my part would emphasize two ingredients in this case which may be absent in other cases. One is the age of this man. He was a very young man at the time, aged 28. The second is, that in the accident the injury to his spine was such as to result in a deformity which one does not always get in paraplegia cases, as a result of which the doctors agree he has suffered very considerable pain, and is likely to suffer from it in the future.

So far as the ruling of the judge is concerned, as to whether other cases should be looked at, I would only like to say this. In my view, it would be calamitous if anything that this court said should impose an additional burden on judges of first instance, and particularly on judges on assize. It has been suggested that counsel on either side will come armed in every case of personal injuries with reports or transcripts in regard to other cases. I, myself, do not think that there is any fear of that. I think that counsel can be trusted only to refer to other cases very sparingly, bearing in mind that each case depends upon its own facts, and only rarely can another case be of real assistance to the judge. And secondly, I think that the discretion must always be in the judge himself to decide whether in his view the reference to such other cases would or would not assist him. I agree with the proposed order.

Appeal allowed.

Company—Winding up—Voluntary liquidation—Petition for compulsory winding up—Opposition by majority of creditors—Whether special circumstances requiring compulsory winding up—Validity of petitioners' debt.

A petition for the compulsory winding up of a company in voluntary liquidation was opposed by a majority, both in value and numbers, of the creditors. The grounds of objection were (1) that the validity of the petitioners' debt was disputed, and (2) that it was desirable that the affairs of the company, which was one of several closely linked companies all of which were in voluntary liquidation, should continue in the hands of the liquidator acting in the voluntary liquidation, because he was acting as liquidator of all the other companies:—

Held, that irrespective of the question whether the petitioners' debt was valid or not, they had not shown any valid reason or special circumstances why effect should not be given to the wishes of the majority of the creditors that the voluntary liquidation should continue. It might be that the company's affairs required investigation by the court, but such an investigation could both conveniently and adequately be made in the course of the existing liquidation.

APPEAL from Vaisey J.

The following statement of facts is taken substantially from the judgment of Romer L.J.

B. Karsberg Ltd. was incorporated in September, 1949, as a private company, with its registered office in London, and with a nominal and issued capital of £10,000. Its objects were to carry on business as manufacturers, importers and exporters, factors, and agents for the sale of and wholesale and retail dealers in carpets, rugs, linoleum, mats, and other floor coverings and other objects set forth in its memorandum of association. The company was one of a group of six associated and closely linked companies, all carrying on business of a similar nature in shops in North London. At the material times all these companies, including B. Karsberg Ltd., were controlled, directly or indirectly, by a Mr. and Mrs. Fredman. They were the directors of B. Karsberg Ltd. On July 12 Mr. Harry Lubbock, F.C.A., and Mr. Philip Fine, F.C.A., A.T.I.I., were appointed directors of this company, at the instance of certain creditors, in place of the Fredmans. On July 15 a debenture was issued to a certain creditor of the company (Messrs. Segal & Berman Ltd.) in order to secure a cash advance which that creditor had made for the purposes of the company. On July 19 Mr. Fine was appointed receiver under that debenture; and on the same day he sent out to the creditors of all the companies in the group a letter which, after referring to the appointment of Mr. Lubbock and Mr. Fine (both of whom are chartered accountants and are partners in a firm of chartered acountants) as the directors, and referring to the above-mentioned debenture, proceeded: "The object of this "letter is to invite you to submit to us immediately full and "detailed particulars of your trading and other transactions with "the above-named companies and any other undertaking with "which Mr. A. Fredman has been connected. We would "emphasize that the action recently taken by" (the company to which the debenture had been given) "has been directed solely "to conserve the assets of the various undertakings concerned "and to ensure that the position which is now under investiga-"tion by us shall not in any way be allowed to deteriorate. The "action has been taken solely for the purpose of protecting all "the creditors concerned, and it is to be hoped that we may "rely on your full co-operation in the investigation which we "have to undertake and which, from present indications, will be "most complicated. It is proposed to take the necessary steps "for the purpose of putting the companies into liquidation at the "earliest moment and formal notices will reach you during the "course of the next few days."

On the following day, July 20, a petition for the winding up of the company was presented by one Moishe Rokach and one Norman Rokach, who claimed to be creditors of the company for a total sum of £5,350, and on the same day an application was made for the appointment of a provisional liquidator of the company. On July 21 Mr. Lubbock and Mr. Fine resigned from the board of the company and two new directors were appointed to act in their place. On July 25 the application for the appointment of a provisional liquidator came before the registrar, and he made no order on the application upon the receiver giving certain undertakings as to dealing with the company's assets, and so forth. On September 2 there was a meeting of the creditors of this company, duly convened, at which the creditors passed a resolution that the company should go into a creditors' voluntary liquidation (that resolution being passed pursuant to section 293 of the Companies Act, 1948), and Mr. Fine was appointed liquidator. Subsequently, all the creditors of the other companies in the group adopted the same course, and all six associated companies went into voluntary liquidation, Mr. Fine being the liquidator in all those liquidations.

On October 17, 1955, the petition relating to B. Karsberg Ltd. came before Vaisey J., and he made an order that that company should be compulsorily wound up. Fifty-one creditors, representing a total value of over £41,000, out of 56 creditors had opposed the petition. One or two creditors who had given notice to support the petition, including the Inland Revenue Commissioners and some insurance companies, when the petition came on for hearing, expressed their willingness to have a supervision order made under section 311 of the Companies Act. All of the 51 creditors appealed.

By paragraph 5 of the petition: "The company is indebted "to your petitioners in the aggregate in the sum of £5,350, being "as to a cheque drawn by the company in favour of your peti- "tioner Moishe Rokach on the National Bank Ltd. . . . for "£1,350, which cheque on presentation was dishonoured by being "referred to the drawer thereof, and a cheque drawn by the "company in favour of A. B. Kahan otherwise known as M. H. "Kahan on the National Bank Ltd. . . . for £1,350 which cheque "on presentation was dishonoured by being referred to the drawer "thereof, and the burden and benefit of such cheque having been "assigned by deed of assignment dated July 19, 1955, to your "petitioner Norman Rokach and further by an agreement dated "January 27, 1955, made between the company of the one part "and your petitioner Norman Rokach of the other part, the " company received from your petitioner Norman Rokach the " sum of £3,100 of which there remains due the sum of £2,650, " for which sum your petitioner Norman Rokach holds post-dated " cheques in respect of which Philip Fine, a director of the " company, has intimated the company's inability to pay these " cheques on their respective dates for maturity. 6. The com- " pany is insolvent and unable to pay its debts. 7. In the " circumstances, it is just and equitable that the company should " be wound up."

In addition to the usual statutory affidavit in support of the petition a further affidavit was sworn by the petitioners in support of their application for the appointment of a provisional liquidator. By paragraph 2 of that affidavit: " The business of the company " is an extensive business and one which would carry a consider- " able amount of stock and involve the turnover of large sums of " money. The goodwill of the company is of considerable value " and would be seriously damaged if not destroyed in the event " of the company's business being hampered, mismanaged or " closed down, or if the large amount of stock required to carry " on the business were depleted."

By paragraph 5 the petitioners said: " The company appears " to be the main company of a number of companies which are " all associated but which carry on different businesses, and we " verily believe that that business of the company is the most " substantial of all the companies and it is therefore essential " that the company's businesses and undertakings shall be pro- " tected. 6. We have caused certain inquiries to be made as a " result of which we find that two alleged substantial creditors of " the company appear to have forced the issue with the previous " directors of the company " (the Fredmans) " and apparently " in fact arranged for the appointment of two of their nominees," namely, Mr. Lubbock and Mr. Fine, as directors of the company.

By paragraph 9 they said: " From further inquiries we have " made we are informed by . . ." Mr. Fine " that there appear " to be no records, stock sheets or other usual company's books " and accounts of the company, and we are informed that it is " suspected that these books and papers were taken away by a " former director of the company, who since the appointment of " the two present directors has disappeared completely together " with his wife."

Mr. Philip Fine put in an affidavit, sworn on October 7, in answer to the petition. After stating that the company (with the other companies) went into a creditors' voluntary liquidation on September 2, 1955, he said: " Prior to the said winding up my " said firm conducted an investigation into the affairs of the " company on behalf of a creditor, and the facts and matters " hereinafter set forth or referred to are matters within my own " knowledge acquired both during the said investigation and as " liquidator as aforesaid. 4. I dispute the allegations set forth " in paragraph 5 of the said petition and deny that the company

" was or is indebted to the petitioners herein or either of them " in the sum of £5,350 in the said petition mentioned or any sum " at all. 5. At all material times the company was one of a " group of private companies . . . which were controlled either " directly or through nominees by " Mr. Fredman and his wife. " 6. The petitioners are unregistered moneylenders and neither of " them has been or is a trade creditor or loan creditor with respect " to the company, nor has either of them been in any way con- " nected with the company or the business thereof. 7. During " the course of many months prior to the said voluntary " liquidation of the company the petitioners (and others including " one M. H. Kahan in the said petition referred to) either jointly " or severally advanced moneys by way of loan to Mr. Fredman " in his personal capacity altogether unrelated to his activities as " a member or director of the company. The said loans were " advanced at unconscionable rates of interest and were utilized " by Mr. Fredman for his own personal use and benefit. 8. Not- " withstanding the fact that not one of the said loans was ever " made to, at the request or for the benefit of the company or is " recorded in any entry whatsoever in the company's books, Mr. " Fredman without any authority, right or power so to do repaid " the said loans and the said interest thereon out of banking " accounts standing in the names of the company, the said " associated companies, the directors thereof and their nominees. " The said accounts were very numerous and, as at present " ascertained, number over 70. The said accounts were brought " into being and operated by Mr. Fredman for his own private " purposes as aforesaid. It appears from the books of the " company that the repayments made to the petitioners by the " company as aforesaid with respect to the said loans are debited " to a loan account with the company in the name of Mr. " Fredman." He then said that the petitioners' alleged loan of £5,350 represented loan transactions of the sort that he had just been mentioning and continued: " neither of the petitioners nor " the said M. H. Kahan ever at any time had any connexion with " the company whether as a loan or trade creditor or howsoever " otherwise. (iii) There is no entry in the books of the company " recording the payment to the company of the said sum of " £5,350, or any part thereof or at all. (iv) That the company " has never been and is not now indebted to the petitioners or " either of them." He went on to say that the petitioners started bankruptcy proceedings against Mr. Fredman, and eventually they withdrew those because Mr. Fredman " consented to a " receiving order being made against him on a bankruptcy petition " brought by another of his creditors. Mr. Fredman was duly " adjudicated bankrupt on September 29, 1955 "; and he ended by repeating the contention that the company was not indebted to the petitioners in the sum which they claimed.

That affidavit elicited an affidavit in reply from the petitioners, sworn on October 14, which came to the hands of the company very shortly before the hearing and was not, for that reason (it was said), dealt with by an affidavit in rejoinder. Mr. Moishe Rokach said: "On May 2, 1955, I advanced the sum of £1,350 "as a loan to the above named company. Of the said sum of "£1,350, £1,250 was paid by cheque and the balance of £100 "was paid in cash. The said sums were paid to Mr. Alec Fred- "man and to his wife Mrs. Betty Fredman (formerly Mrs. Betty "Karsberg) who was then a director of the company and was paid "to them as a loan to the company." Then he referred to an agreement under which the company acknowledged that it had received that sum and undertook to repay it on June 6, 1955; and that agreement was signed on behalf of the company by Mrs. Fredman. "At the same time," he said, "she handed to me "a cheque dated June 6, 1955, and drawn on the company's "account with the National Bank Ltd. for the sum of £1,350. "The said cheque was duly presented for payment on June 6, "1955, and was dishonoured"; and he produced the agreement and the cheque. Then he said: "I do not now nor have I ever "carried on business as a moneylender."

Mr. Norman Rokach for himself said that on June 16, 1955, Mr. Moishe Kahan "advanced the sum of £1,350 as a loan to "the above named company. The said sum was paid in cash "and was paid to the said Mr. Alec Fredman and the said Mrs. "Betty Fredman, who was then a director of the company. "8. By an agreement in writing dated June 16, 1955, the above "named company acknowledged that it had received the sum of "£1,350 from Mr. Moishe Hersch Kahan (there described as "Mr. A. B. Kahan) and undertook to repay the same on July 14, "1955. The said agreement is agreed," "signed," presumably, was meant, "on behalf of the company by Mrs. Betty Fredman "under the name of 'B. Karsberg' at the same time handed to "me a cheque drawn on the company's account with the National "Bank Ltd. for the sum of £1,350. The said cheque was duly "presented on July 14, 1955, by the said A. B. Kahan and was "dishonoured." On July 19, 1955, Mr. Kahan assigned the debt of £1,350 to him; and he exhibited the agreement and the cheque, and the deed of assignment. By paragraph 11 he said: "By a "memorandum under seal dated January 27, 1955, the company "acknowledged that it had received from me sums totalling "£3,150 and the company undertook to repay the same to me "in the manner and on the dates therein referred to, and it was "further agreed by the company that if the company should "suffer any act of bankruptcy or insolvency the whole of the "said sum should become immediately repayable. 12. The said "memorandum under seal was signed by the said Mr. Alec Fred- "man and the said Betty Fredman on behalf of the company"; and Mr. Norman Rokach then produced the memorandum, and said, by paragraph 14: "I do not nor have I ever carried on "business as a moneylender."

By paragraph 16 Moishe Rokach and Norman Rokach jointly said: "By a letter dated August 29, 1955, the said Mr. Alec "Fredman informed us that all moneys advanced by us to Mr. "Alec Fredman and Mrs. Betty Fredman were borrowed on "behalf of the above named company and was used for the "benefit of the said company"; and they produced that letter. Paragraph 17 was about the change of directors. By paragraph 18: "On September 2, 1955, a meeting of its creditors was called "by the above named company pursuant to the provisions of "section 293 of the Companies Act, 1948, and at the said meeting "it was resolved that the said company be wound up voluntarily "and that the said Mr. Philip Fine be appointed liquidator of "the company. No notice of the said meeting was given to us "or to either one of us notwithstanding that the petition herein "had been filed."

In addition to the cases referred to in the judgment of Romer L.J., the following were cited in argument: In re Rica Gold Washing Co.[1]; In re Wear Engine Works Co.[2]

Birkett L.J. I will ask Romer L.J. to deliver the first judgment.

Romer L.J. This is an appeal from an order which Vaisey J. made on November 4, 1955, for the compulsory winding up of a company called B. Karsberg Ltd. The company opposed the petition, as did also the great majority of the creditors of the company. It is hardly necessary, perhaps, for me to say that it is always with hesitation and diffidence that I differ from the views which Vaisey J. takes, and especially perhaps on company matters, of which he has such great experience; but I have come to the conclusion in this case that the appeal should be allowed, for reasons that I will state.

Certain facts and dates are undisputed. [His Lordship referred to the facts as stated above and continued:] The affidavits and the exhibits (set out above) were the material which was before the judge when he dealt with the petition. We have no notes of any reasons which were expressed by the judge which led him to the conclusion that this company should be wound up, but we have been told that, while he realized the strength of the opposition of the creditors, he thought that the facts as disclosed by the evidence raised a proper case for investigation and a public examination, and he came to the conclusion that it was in the interests of the creditors that there should be a compulsory winding up, in the course of which such an examination as he thought was desirable could most efficiently and thoroughly be carried out. But the creditors do not take before us the view, nor indeed did they take the view before the judge, that it was in their interests that a compulsory winding-up order should be made, and it is for that reason that they and the company have appealed.

Mr. Blackledge, for the appellants, put his case in various ways. In the first place, he said that the petitioners' debt is genuinely disputed, on the ground, first, that the petitioners are unregistered moneylenders, and that the loans on which the petition is founded were usurious in character; and, secondly, that in any event the loans, if made, were made to the Fredmans for their personal use and not for the use of the company. As to the first objection, it is, of course, clear that the court will not in general make a winding up order on a disputed debt and will not determine the validity of the debt itself, but will leave the alleged creditor to establish it by proper proceedings. But for my part I feel a difficulty in taking the view that the petition should have been dismissed on the first ground on which Mr. Blackledge relied, because there was a complete conflict of evidence on the affidavits as to whether the petitioners are moneylenders or not. The petitioners have sworn that they are not; and there was no cross-examination on the point.

As to the alleged usurious rate of interest, the matter is only one of speculation, based upon the form which the transactions took and the documents which were before the court. It is enough, I think, if I say that suspicion has arisen and has been expressed upon certain aspects of these loans, an example of which is sufficiently found in the petitioners' affidavit in reply, where, by paragraph 3, Moishe Rokach said that he advanced £1,350, of which £1,250 was paid by cheque and the balance of £100 was paid in cash. It is suggested that that would lead either to the inference that this gentleman was lending the company this considerable sum for no interest at all, or, as a matter of inference arising from the improbability of such a transaction, that in fact the £100 cash was either never paid at all or, having been paid, was immediately restored into the pockets of Moishe Rokach.

That is an example of the approach which the appellants make to these alleged loan transactions; but, as I say, on the evidence before us it is a matter merely of surmise, and inasmuch as the petitioners' debt will have to be dealt with, if and when it is submitted to proof, I propose to say no more about that approach to the matter.

As to the suggestion that in any event if the loans were made they were made to the Fredmans for their personal use and not for the use of the company, the cheques and various agreements and acknowledgments which were produced by the petitioners show on their face that the loans were in fact made to the company, that the company was liable to repay them, and that that liability was merely coupled with a personal guarantee by the Fredmans which would be collateral to the liability of the company.

Accordingly, I think there is much to be said in favour of Mr. Vinelott's submission that the company has not shown, upon the material which is before us, that there are grounds upon which the debts can be said to be bona fide disputed. That is a matter, however, which will have to be dealt with hereafter.

But Mr. Blackledge's second point is the point upon which, in my opinion, this appeal must succeed. His point is that where (as is the case here) practically the whole of the company's creditors, both in value and in number, oppose a compulsory order, the court should regard their wishes in the matter and should not force an order upon them merely because the petitioners want it. Here there is no doubt whatever that the creditors as a whole are opposed to an order being made. They have faith in Mr. Fine, whom their committee appointed liquidator in this and in the other voluntary liquidations; and, as the group of companies is in their view so essentially interlocked, they want the affairs of all the companies to be in Mr. Fine's hands. It is, of course, true that notwithstanding a voluntary liquidation a creditor can petition for a compulsory order under section 310 of the Companies Act, 1948. But there can be no doubt that the general principle is, as Mr. Blackledge has submitted it to be, that the court will pay great regard to the wishes of the majority of the creditors; and the matter was clearly laid down Simonds J. in In re Home Remedies Ltd.,[1] the headnote of which is: "The rule still prevails that, "where a company is in voluntary liquidation and a petition is "presented for its compulsory winding up, the court is bound "to have regard, not only to the wishes of the petitioning "creditor, but also to those of all the creditors. The rule is not "affected by the provision in section 255 of the Companies Act, "1929"—that is now section 310 of the Act of 1948—"that "the voluntary winding-up of a company shall not bar the right "of any creditor to have it wound up by the court." Simonds J. said[2]: "No reason has been shown why a compulsory order is "necessary to protect the rights of the petitioning creditor or "any other creditor, but counsel for the petitioner claims that "the court is bound to make an order in his favour in spite of "the opposition. In In re James Millward & Co. Ltd.[3] it was "decided that, on the true construction of section 255 of the "Companies Act, 1929, a creditor of a company in voluntary "liquidation, on proving his judgment debt and that it has not "been satisfied, is, as between himself and the company, "entitled ex debito justitiae to an order for the compulsory "winding up of the company. That case, however, did not "decide that the old rule of the court that, where a company "is in voluntary liquidation, the court, before making an order "for its winding-up, is bound to have regard not only to the "wishes of the petitioner but also to those of the other creditors, "has been abrogated. It is true that section 255 of the Companies Act, 1929, has made an alteration in the law so that "it is no longer necessary for a petitioning creditor to show that "he is prejudiced by a voluntary liquidation, but, as between "himself and the other creditors, the old rule remains, and the "court has to consider the wishes of all the creditors. If the "majority of the creditors wish to continue the voluntary "liquidation and no valid reason is shown why effect should not "be given to their wishes, the court will not make a winding-up "order. There is nothing in the decision in In re James Millward & Co. Ltd.[3] to the contrary. Here the great majority "of the creditors are in favour of a continuance of the voluntary "winding-up and no suggestion has been made that in such a "winding-up the interest of any creditor will be prejudiced"; and he dismissed the petition.

Roxburgh J., in In re Ithaca Shipping Co. Ltd.[4] (which was a petition for the winding up of a company which was opposed by creditors), said: "The petitioning creditor is a judgment "creditor for some £60, or thereabouts. He is supported by a "creditor for £133. As against the company, the petitioner and "his supporting creditor would be entitled to a winding-up order "ex debito justitiae. But it is said on behalf of Mr. Vlassopoulos, "whose position I will describe in a moment, that he is a "creditor for £3,000 and that he opposes the petition, and that, "in those circumstances, as it is opposed by a majority in value "of the creditors, an order ought not to be made." "As a "general proposition," the judge continued, "that is quite true, "but it is a proposition which is always subject to the proof "of special circumstances, and, in my judgment, those special "circumstances have in this case been clearly demonstrated."

In my judgment, it follows from the principles as stated in those cases (and, indeed, the principles are long and well established) that in the present case an order should not have been made unless a "valid reason" or "special circumstances" were shown by the petitioners why effect should not be given to the wishes of the majority of the creditors that the voluntary liquidation should continue. Mr. Vinelott relied on the desirability (in which indeed the opponents themselves concur) of having a thorough examination into the management (or mismanagement) of the company in the past. In compulsory liquidations facilities for that are afforded by the Companies Act, 1948, s. 270 (1), which provides: "Where an order has been "made in England for winding up a company by the court, and "the official receiver has made a further report under this Act

[4] (1950) 84 Ll.L.Rep. 507.

"stating that in his opinion a fraud has been committed by any "person in the promotion or formation of the company or by "any officer of the company in relation to the company since its "formation, the court may, after consideration of the report, "direct that that person or officer shall attend before the court "on a day appointed by the court for that purpose and be "publicly examined as to the promotion or formation or the "conduct of the business of the company or as to his conduct "and dealings as officer thereof." But under section 307 of the Act these facilities can be made available, and in fact are frequently extended, to a voluntary winding up on an application being made to the court by the liquidator or a contributory or a creditor in the voluntary winding up. Subsection (1) provides: "The liquidator or any contributory or creditor may apply to "the court to determine any question arising in the winding up "of a company, or to exercise, as respects the enforcing of calls "or any other matter, all or any of the powers which the court "might exercise if the company were being wound up by the "court." Subsection (2) says: "The court, if satisfied that "the determination of the question or the required exercise of "power will be just and beneficial, may accede wholly or "partially to the application on such terms and conditions as "it thinks fit or may make such other order on the application "as it thinks just."

Recently Wynn-Parry J. held in In re Campbell Coverings Ltd. (No. 2) [5] (and in so holding he was following an indication of an opinion which Evershed M.R. had expressed in an earlier case of the same name [6]) that under section 307 the court has jurisdiction to order the public examination of a director, pursuant to section 270 (1). So that by conjunction of sections 270 and 307 it will be open to the liquidator or a creditor in the existing voluntary winding up to apply to the court for directions and for a public examination of the past directors or other persons in the same way as could be done in a compulsory winding up. There is further provision which is to be found in section 334 of the Act, which is a section applicable both to compulsory and voluntary liquidations, whereby under subsection (2) it is provided that: "If it appears to the liquidator in the course of a "voluntary winding up that any past or present officer, or any "member, of the company has been guilty of any offence in "relation to the company for which he is criminally liable," he shall report the matter to the director of public prosecutions. Subsection (2) of that section applies to voluntary liquidations, and subsection (1) is the subsection which applies to compulsory liquidations.

Accordingly, it would appear to me that the objection founded on the ground that an investigation of the affairs of the company is both desirable and should be carried out (and there is much to be said in favour of that view) is sufficiently met by the fact that such an investigation can both conveniently and adequately be made in the course of the existing voluntary liquidation. Of course, there are some cases which one can imagine where the court would make a compulsory order against the wishes of the majority of the creditors; and, indeed, Mr. Vinelott referred to one such, namely, In re Northumberland and Durham District Banking Co.[7] I do not think that any principle is to be extracted from that case. It was a very special case, and having regard to the very peculiar circumstances which were proved to exist in that case the court thought it right to make a compulsory order, in preference to allowing the voluntary liquidation to continue. But I am clearly of opinion that no such circumstances exist here. It appears to me that while it may truly be said, as Mr. Vinelott submitted, that the necessity of investigation may constitute in some cases a "special circumstance" within the language of Roxburgh J. in the case which I have just quoted, it ought not to have much weight in the present case, where both Mr. Fine and all the creditors who stand behind him in the matter, and who constitute practically the whole of the creditors of the company, will obviously take full advantage of the means for investigation and inquiry which are afforded in voluntary liquidations, as I have indicated.

There are many matters which will require thorough investigation in this case, as far as I can see, but it will be obviously in the interests of the creditors themselves (who include banks and other responsible bodies) to see that every possible investigation is made with stringency. For my part, I think that there are no circumstances shown here, such as were shown in In re Northumberland and Durham District Banking Co.,[7] which should disturb the view that the majority of the creditors should have their wishes fully regarded and given effect to.

Mr. Vinelott suggested that a reason personal to the petitioners why there should be a compulsory winding up is that Mr. Fine (who is the liquidator under the voluntary winding up) has, so it is said, shown prejudice against the petitioners—that, as appears from the evidence, the liquidator has said that the petitioners are moneylenders and usurious, and also that he ignored their position of petitioning creditors when he convened a meeting of the creditors. In my opinion that is no sufficient reason to force a compulsory order upon the majority of the creditors. I have no doubt that Mr. Fine, who is a responsible and reputable professional gentleman, will approach the petitioners' position and claims with impartiality, and if he is satisfied as to the bona fides of the debt he will treat the petitioners with complete fairness and justice. No other reason was suggested apart from that why the petitioners would be prejudiced if the voluntary liquidation was allowed to continue, and it is indeed difficult to see why a course which is desired by practically the whole of the creditors of the company, and which in their view will be of the greatest advantage to them, should also not be of advantage to the petitioners themselves.

Finally, it was suggested that the judge had made an order partly on the ground (which is one of the statutory grounds for presenting a petition under section 222) that it is just and equitable that the company should be wound up. Mr. Blackledge said that an order could not be made on that ground because no circumstances were disclosed in the petition, other than insolvency itself, which brought the case within the "just and "equitable" provision and, indeed, that the petitioners only stated in their petition that it was just and equitable to wind up the company because of the alleged insolvency. [His Lordship, in stating the facts set out above, had observed that the statement that it was just and equitable that the company should be wound up, in paragraph 7 of the petition, was founded upon the circumstances of the petition, and that the only circumstance to which reference was made in the petition related to the alleged insolvency of the company.] I think that Mr. Blackledge was probably right in saying that if no case were made out in the petition for a "just and equitable" ground, then the court could not, if all the matters on which the petitioners relied failed, make an order on the ground that it was just and equitable.

For my part, I do not think that the judge made an order upon that ground at all; and, indeed, I understood Mr. Vinelott to say that his clients do not rely on the "just and equitable" provision as distinct from insolvency. But although, as I say, we unfortunately do not know very much of what happened before the judge, it appears to me as most probable that he decided this question as to the validity of the debt adversely to the company, and, accordingly, made the winding-up order on that ground, and simply resorted to the suggestions in the evidence as to irregularity in the conduct of the company as confirming his view that the petitioners were entitled to an order, and as justifying a departure from the usual rule that the interests of the majority of the creditors should be considered. But, as I have already said, having regard to the ample and powerful facilities which are open to a liquidator and creditors for investigation and inquiry in a voluntary winding up, I do not think that that is an objection to the voluntary liquidation being allowed to continue.

I, accordingly, would allow this appeal, on the ground which I have tried to make clear, that the overwhelming majority of the creditors of this company are against the making of a compulsory order, that they are content that the voluntary liquidation should continue, and that the petitioners have shown no ground of hardship or injustice upon which the court could base a departure from the ordinary principles to which I have referred.

Road Traffic—Disqualification—Power to vary—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (20 & 21 Geo. 5, c. 43), s. 7 (3).

On an application under section 7 (3) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, the court has power to remove the disqualification for holding a licence or to refuse the application, but it cannot vary the disqualification whether by limiting the class of vehicle to which it applies or otherwise.

APPLICATION.

On July 12, 1954, the applicant, Haydn Cottrell, pleaded Guilty at Swansea Assizes before Glyn-Jones J. to a charge of dangerous driving and was ordered to pay a fine of £50 and was disqualified from driving all motor-vehicles for five years. In announcing the disqualification, Glyn-Jones J. expressed the opinion that, if at the end of a year, the court was satisfied with the applicant's behaviour, he (his Lordship) would not think it out of keeping with the spirit of his sentence that the applicant should then have the disqualification varied so as to permit him to ride his motor bicycle.

The applicant was of good behaviour during the ensuing year and now applied under section 7 (3) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930,[1] for the variation of the disqualification, so as to permit him to drive a motor-cycle.

REGINA v. COTTRELL.

McNAIR J. In this matter an application is made to me on behalf of Haydn Cottrell who pleaded guilty at these assizes in 1954 before Glyn-Jones J. to the offence of dangerous driving which involved the death of a bystander, and he was sentenced to a fine of £50 together with a disqualification from driving any class of motor-vehicle for a period of five years. In imposing that disqualification the judge said: "In addition, you will be "disqualified from driving all motor-vehicles for a period of five "years, but I do not want necessarily to bring it about that you "never drive even your motor bicycle during the whole of that "period, and I will say this, that you have your right to apply, "on the proper grounds, for the removal of that disqualification "after an appropriate interval and I will express the opinion "that, if at the end of one year from now the court is satisfied "with your behaviour and performance, I should not think it "out of keeping with the spirit of my sentence that you should "then have the disqualification varied so as to permit you to "ride your motor bicycle."

Since that sentence of disqualification was imposed the applicant has behaved in a perfectly proper manner, and in September, 1954, he volunteered and undertook a three years' engagement with the Royal Engineers and is at present stationed at Southampton, training as a crane operator in the port battalion there. His commanding officer says that since joining the Royal Engineers his character and behaviour have been of an irreproachable nature; he is a sober, good worker and always well-turned out in dress.

In those circumstances, if I felt I had power to accede to the application, which is an application, not for the removal of the whole disqualification, but for varying the disqualification so as to permit the applicant to ride a motor bicycle whilst maintaining the general disqualification, I should have been prepared to accede to it. [His Lordship read section 7 (3) of the Act of 1930, and continued:] It is to be noted that in that provision there appear to be only two powers given to the court: either a power of removing the disqualification, or a power to refuse the application, whereas under section 6 of the Act, under which the original disqualification was imposed, there was an express power in the court, if it thought fit, to limit the disqualification imposed to the driving of a motor-vehicle of the same class or description as the vehicle in relation to which the offence was committed.

Although I think the facts would justify the exercise of "application the court may, as it "thinks proper, having regard to the "character of the person disqualified "and his conduct subsequent to the "conviction or order, the nature of "the offence, and any other circum- "stances of the case, either by order "remove the disqualification as from "such date as may be specified in the "order or refuse the application."

REGINA v. COTTRELL.

discretion in favour of varying the disqualification in the way in which the application asks—at any rate, it would be in line with the views of the judge who imposed the disqualification—I do not feel that I have power to do anything other than remove the disqualification or to refuse the application. Seeing that I do not think the facts justify the removal of the disqualification in whole, I exercise the alternative power given under that section of refusing the application.

But, at the same time, I can see there may be cases where it might be convenient that the court was given a power to vary a disqualification. But, as at present advised, it is my opinion that this section, as enacted, does not give a power of variation. It is, however, clearly a question upon which other minds might reach a different conclusion.

Application refused.

* PROSPECTOR (OWNERS) v. CHUSAN (OWNERS). THE CHUSAN.

Shipping—Collision—Fog—"Moderate" speed—Circumstances to be considered — Radar — Continuous radar watch not being kept — Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, 1910, art. 16.

The plaintiffs' vessel, the Prospector, was in collision with the defendants' vessel, the Chusan, in the Straits of Dover. The weather was foggy with visibility two to three cables. The Prospector was proceeding at a speed of about eight knots, sounding regulation fog signals. Those on board the Prospector failed to stop their engines on hearing, forward of their beam, a fog signal from the Chusan, and altered course before the position and course of the Chusan were ascertained. The Chusan, a twin-screw turbine vessel, equipped with a radar set, was proceeding at a speed of about seven knots. On the bridge of the Chusan the master and chief officer periodically looked at the radar screen, but no continuous radar watch was being kept. The approach of the Prospector was not observed by radar, and a signal of one long blast was the first warning which those on board the Chusan received of the presence of the Prospector. In spite of the engines of each vessel being put astern, both vessels had some residual forward way at the moment of collision:—

Held, that it is part of a seaman's duty, in the exercise of reasonable care, to take full advantage of any equipment with which his vessel is supplied, and the fact that a continuous radar watch is not being kept on board a vessel supplied with a radar set, and which has an officer available to keep such a watch, is a circumstance to be taken into consideration in deciding whether the speed of the vessel is excessive; that in the circumstances the speeds of both vessels were excessive, but the Prospector was further to blame in that those on board her failed to stop their engines in compliance with article 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, 1910, and prematurely altered their heading before the position and course of the Chusan had been ascertained; and that the vessels were to blame in the proportions of three-quarters to the Prospector and one-quarter to the Chusan.

Per curiam. I wish to make it abundantly clear that what I have said is not to be interpreted as meaning that a vessel which does maintain a continuous watch on her radar is thereby entitled to proceed at an excessive speed in fog.

ACTION.

On June 12, 1953, the plaintiffs' vessel, Prospector, was in collision with the defendants' vessel, Chusan, in the Straits of Dover, near the South Goodwin lightship. At the time of the collision, the Prospector, a vessel of 6,165 tons gross, fitted with reciprocating engines of 3,350 h.p.i., laden with a general cargo, was on a voyage from the West Indies to London. The Chusan, a twin-screw passenger vessel of 24,215 tons gross, fitted with steam turbine engines of 42,300 h.p.i., was in the course of a cruise from Tilbury to the Mediterranean.

Shortly before the collision the Prospector was proceeding on a course of 52° (True), an almost opposite course to that of the Chusan, with engines working at half-speed ahead, making a speed of about 8 knots, and sounding regulation fog signals. On a fog signal being heard twice from a vessel forward of the beam of the Prospector, the vessel's engines were put slow speed ahead, and were stopped on a third signal being heard. Shortly afterwards, on sighting a black form, which proved to be the black boot-topping of the Chusan, the helm of the Prospector was put hard-to-port, and a signal of two short blasts sounded. Thereafter, the engines of the Prospector were put full speed astern, and a signal of three short blasts sounded, which signal was repeated shortly afterwards. The port helm of the Prospector took effect before the collision occurred.

Shortly before the collision the Chusan was proceeding at a speed of about 7 knots, with engines working at slow speed ahead, on a course of 230° (True), sounding regulation fog signals. The radar set in the chartroom on the bridge of the Chusan was working, but the approach of the Prospector was not observed by radar. On hearing a fog signal from a vessel forward of their beam, the engines of the Chusan were stopped, and, shortly afterwards, when a subsequent fog signal was heard, the engines of the Chusan were put half-speed astern, a signal of three short blasts being sounded. A signal of two short blasts was heard from the Prospector, and when, what was thought to be a further signal of two short blasts was heard, the engines of the Chusan were put full speed astern. At about this moment the Prospector was sighted visually.

The stem of the Chusan and the starboard bow of the Prospector came into contact at an angle of 15° leading aft on the Prospector, and both vessels at the moment of collision had some residual forward way.

The plaintiffs claimed that the collision was solely caused by the improper and negligent navigation of those on board the Chusan. The defendants denied negligence and counterclaimed against the plaintiffs, alleging that the collision was solely caused by the improper and negligent navigation of those on board the Prospector.

The following cases and authorities were cited in argument: Marsden's Collisions at Sea, 10th ed., p. 480; The Marigola *; The Memnon v. The Paulsboro †; The Esso Plymouth.‡

WILLMER J., after stating the facts and finding the Prospector to blame for breaches of article 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, 1910,[1] in that she proceeded at an excessive speed in fog and failed to stop her engines on hearing the fog signal of a vessel forward of her beam, and further, for prematurely altering course to port before the position and course of the Chusan were ascertained, continued: The Chusan was a high-powered vessel, a vessel with good pulling-up power. No doubt it can be said with force that for such a vessel a higher speed in knots can be justified than would be justified in the case of other vessels with less engine power and less pulling-up capacity. In judging the speed of the vessel one must also take into consideration the area in which she was navigating (that is to say, in this case, rounding the Goodwin Sands and passing through the Straits of Dover), and the extent of the visibility.

There is also another fact to which I must now refer for the first time, but which, I think, is material to be taken into consideration. The Chusan was fitted, as one would expect a large passenger ship to be fitted, with a radar set. It is the fact that no warning of the presence of the Prospector had been detected on the radar screen of the Chusan; but it is also the fact that, at the material time, there was no officer on continuous watch at the radar set. The radar screen is mounted inside the chartroom, and the evidence showed that both the master and the chief officer (who had been specially called to the bridge because the weather was foggy) were going in and out spasmodically and looking at the radar screen; but it so happened that on none of the occasions when either of those officers looked at the radar screen was any trace of the Prospector found. The result was that the first which the Chusan knew of the presence of the Prospector was when she heard the whistle signal to which I have already referred. This is a matter which I have considered very carefully with the Elder Brethren. I think that all those circumstances must be taken into consideration in deciding whether in a particular case a vessel is proceeding at a proper speed or not.

I have already expressed the view that the Chusan, like the Prospector, had some residual forward way at the time of the collision. Again, I am not imputing any desire to tell an untruth to any of the witnesses who said that from their observation their vessel was stopped. I am advised by the Elder Brethren—and I readily accept their advice—that observing from the height of the bridge of the Chusan it would be practically impossible to judge within a knot or so whether the vessel was completely stopped or not. I am satisfied that the Chusan did carry some residual forward way; in other words, having got as long notice as it was reasonable to expect of the approaching Prospector, she had not, in fact, succeeded in taking off all her way. Against that it can be said, of course, that perhaps she would have done if the Prospector had not been proceeding so fast, and if the Prospector had got off more of her way. That, of course, is rather speculative.

I have come to the conclusion that for a vessel of this character navigating in this area, in these conditions of visibility, and in circumstances in which a continuous watch was not being kept on the radar, a speed of 7 knots was excessive. I find no other fault with the Chusan, but I do not see that I can avoid concluding that the excessive speed of the Chusan was a factor contributing to the collision.

Before I leave that point and consider the apportionment of blame as between the two vessels, I should like to add a footnote to what I have already said about the radar. If only to set at rest the fears expressed by Mr. Naisby in the course of argument, about the possible effect of any observations I may make about speed in relation to continuous observation on the radar—and if it is any comfort to Mr. Naisby, I would gladly add that my advisers also feel very concerned about the same subject—I wish to make it abundantly clear that what I have said is not to be interpreted as meaning that a vessel which does maintain a continuous watch on her radar is thereby entitled to proceed at an excessive speed in fog. I hope that nothing I have said in this case can be twisted round and used in future cases in such a way that it may seem to justify a speed which would otherwise be excessive, merely on the basis of a continuous watch being maintained on the radar set. I approach the matter in this way.

THE CHUSAN.

Willmer J.

It seems to me part of any seaman's duty, in the exercise of reasonable care, to take full advantage of any equipment with which his vessel is equipped. After all, a radar set is not the only kind of equipment with which one expects a modern steamship to be supplied. It is the fact that this equipment is supplied to be used, and used intelligently; but I am far from saying that the use of this equipment can be prayed in aid so as to justify navigation that would otherwise be reckless.

Having said that, it remains for me to consider the apportionment of blame as between these two particular vessels.

I entertain no doubt at all that there is a clear preponderance of blame in this case as against the plaintiffs' ship, the Prospector, and in favour of the defendants' ship, the Chusan. The plaintiffs' ship, in addition to the fault of excessive speed (which, on my findings, she shares with the Chusan), was also guilty of additional faults, to which I have already referred, in failing to stop her engines when she should have done under article 16, and in taking premature helm action. Moreover, in my judgment, the initial excessive speed of the Prospector was, as a matter of degree, more blameworthy than the initial excessive speed of the Chusan. It was not only a higher speed in knots, but the Prospector was a vessel that had far less engine power and, therefore, less capacity for stopping. In those circumstances there can be no doubt but that by far the greater proportion of blame should be attached to the plaintiffs' ship. Having considered what the fair apportionment should be in all the circumstances, I have come to the conclusion that the Prospector was to blame to the extent of three-quarters, and the Chusan one-quarter.

Fatal Accidents Acts — Damages — Infant dependant — Remarriage of widow—Right of infant to damages after remarriage of widow—Fatal Accidents Act, 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93).

About nine months after the death of her husband in an accident for which the defendants, his employers, admitted liability, the widow remarried a good man of similar income to her late husband. In an action under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, as administratrix of the estate of her deceased husband the widow claimed, inter alia, damages for her infant daughter, as a dependant of the deceased. The trial judge held that the child was entitled to damages only in respect of the weeks prior to the remarriage of the mother, and he awarded her £36:—

Held, that once it was shown that the child had suffered a loss of dependency under the Fatal Accidents Acts, the onus of proving that the dependency originally lost had ceased entirely on the remarriage of the mother shifted to the defendants, and they had failed to discharge it; and that although it would be wrong altogether to disregard the fact that the child had acquired a kind and generous stepfather, the court could not regard the moral obligation which he had undertaken as the financial equivalent of the legal obligation of a father, and the award to the child should be increased to £200.

APPEAL from Donovan J.

On January 15, 1951, Alexander Scott, a welder employed by the defendants, Clarke Chapman & Co. Ltd., engineers, fell from a height while working at a power station in course of construction at Naval Row, Poplar, and was killed. The defendants admitted liability for the accident. The widow brought an action on behalf of herself and her infant daughter, claiming damages under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, and also in respect of the loss of expectation of life under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934. She brought the action as Mrs. Anne Mead, administratrix of the estate of Alexander Scott, having married on September 27, 1951, a lorry driver named Mead. At the time of his death Scott was earning £8 10s. per week, and Mead's earnings were stated to be the same in amount.

At the trial of the action it was contended for the defendants that in the circumstances the dependency of the wife upon the husband who was killed ceased when she remarried. Donovan J. accepted that contention and, calculating the plaintiff's loss at £5 per week for the 36 weeks prior to her remarriage, he awarded £180 damages under the Fatal Accidents Act, apportioned as to £144 to the plaintiff and £36 to the infant. He also awarded the plaintiff £400 under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, and £35 in respect of funeral expenses.

This appeal was brought by the plaintiff in respect of the award to the infant, the judge having limited the child's right to damages to the 36 weeks before the mother remarried and the child acquired a step-father.

SINGLETON L.J. Mr. Alexander Scott was a welder employed by the defendants, Clarke Chapman & Co. Ltd., who are engineers. On January 15, 1951, he was working at a power station which was in the course of construction at Naval Row, Poplar. He fell from a height and was killed. The defendants recognize that his death was brought about through their negligence and that they are responsible in damages to his widow. This action is brought by the widow on her own behalf and on behalf of her small daughter, who was born on September 24, 1950; that is, about four months before her father was killed. On September 27, 1951, the widow married again. She married a man named Mead, and her action is brought in the name of Anne Mead. She claimed damages under the Fatal Accidents Act of 1846, an Act which provided that an action would lie in respect of the death of a person when the death was caused by the wrongful act, neglect or default of someone. Section 2 of the Act provides that "Every such action shall be for the "benefit of the wife, husband, parent, and child of the person "whose death shall have been so caused, and shall be brought "by and in the name of the executor or administrator of the "person deceased; and in every such action the jury may give "such damages as they may think proportioned to the injury "resulting from such death to the parties respectively for whom "and for whose benefit such action shall be brought." The action may now be brought in the name of the widow, if there is no executor or administrator; and, merely in order to show that I do not overlook it, there is a definition of the word "child" in section 5 of the Act.

It was claimed on behalf of the widow that she was entitled to damages under the Fatal Accidents Act and that her daughter was entitled to damages. There was also a claim for damages by the widow under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, in respect of the loss of expectation of life of her husband. Donovan J., before whom the case came, awarded the plaintiff the sum of £400 under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, and a further sum of £35 in respect of funeral expenses.

The question of difficulty which arose was in regard to the damages to be awarded under the Fatal Accidents Act. Mr. Scott was 23 years old when he was killed. He was earning £8 10s. a week as a welder. No evidence was given about what he might have earned if he had lived a little longer, though most of us know that wages of workmen of that type have increased considerably. The second husband, Mr. Mead, is a lorry driver, and at the date of the trial he was earning £8 10s. a week. That is precisely the same sum as the first husband was earning—but there is 4½ years' difference in time. However, it was taken without objection that the earnings of the first husband were the same as the earnings of the second husband.

It was submitted to the judge on behalf of the defendants that dependency of the wife upon the husband who was killed ceased when she married a second time, and that no damages ought to be given to her in respect of any time after her second marriage, for it was said that there was no loss thereafter; she was as well off as she was before. That was accepted by the judge. He awarded damages to the plaintiff in respect of the 36 weeks' period between the death of her first husband and her marriage to Mr. Mead. She had said that her husband gave her £6 10s. a week, and the judge calculated that the loss to the family was £5 a week for 36 weeks, and thus he awarded £180 damages under the Fatal Accidents Act. He divided those in this way: "I apportion £36 to the infant and the balance of "£144 to the plaintiff." I have said already that he awarded damages to the plaintiff as the executrix or administratrix of her husband's estate, under the Law Reform Act. Strictly, the damages awarded under the one ought to be set off against the other, but that was not done and no question is raised upon it in this appeal.

The damages awarded to the child, who was four months old at the time of her father's death, are very small, £36, and they were given in respect of the period up to the second marriage of her mother. Before her first husband's death the plaintiff and her husband and her child were living in a room at her mother's house. She and her second husband and her child now have a room in another house, and she has a child of her second marriage. There was very little evidence, just a few answers by the plaintiff and about eight questions in cross-examination. Mr. Russell asked her: "Would it be right to say that really, so far as the way you live is concerned, you are living very much the same as when your husband was alive? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Is your present husband fond of Christine? (A.) Yes, very fond. (Q.) He looks after her nicely? (A.) Yes. (Q.) He is a lorry driver? (A.) Yes"; and that is the end of the evidence.

It is said on behalf of the defendants that the child's right to damages ceased to be effective when her mother married again, by reason of the fact that the second husband, her step-father, was kind to her and looked after her and treated her nicely. The judge yielded to that argument and gave no damages to the child in respect of any time after the second marriage of her mother. The plaintiff appeals, not against the award of damages to her, for in one sense she got more than she might have got, because of the point which might have been taken that the damages awarded under the Law Reform Act fell to be considered as against the amount awarded to the widow under the Fatal Accidents Act. Mr. Scarman, on behalf of the plaintiff, submitted that the judge should have paid no regard to the fact that the daughter had a step-father, as the benefit from that quarter did not accrue to the daughter as the result of the death. Secondly, and alternatively, he submitted that if he was wrong in his first submission, the judge was wrong in holding that the dependency wholly ceased when the daughter acquired a step-father.

The question of damages under the Fatal Accidents Act leads to questions of some nicety. It is clear that the damages to be awarded must be based on pecuniary loss or expectation of pecuniary loss. I do not propose to go through the authorities which have been cited to us, one of the most useful of which is Baker v. Dalgleish Steam Shipping Co.,[1] and in particular, the judgment of Scrutton L.J. I do not read it, for it is sufficient for my purpose to refer to a case in this court quite recently, Peacock v. Amusement Equipment Co. Ltd.,[2] where the question arose as to the measure of damages under the Fatal Accidents Act. There was a sum of money which had been paid by step-children to their step-father, which money they had received from their mother's estate. Their handing a portion of the money they had received to their step-father was a voluntary act; and it was held that the amount received by the step-father from his step-children ought not to be deducted from the amount awarded under the Fatal Accidents Act as damages in respect of the death of the plaintiff's wife.

Somervell L.J., in the course of his judgment, cited words of Scrutton L.J. in Baker v. Dalgleish Steam Shipping Co.[3] as follows[4]: " Scrutton L.J. also said: ' The same principle applies " ' to voluntary benefits conferred in consequence of the death. " ' Just as in assessing the loss by the death the probability of " ' voluntary contribution destroyed by the death of the contri- " ' butor may be included to swell the claim, so the probability " ' of voluntary contribution bestowed in consequence of the " ' death may be used to reduce the claim by showing what " ' loss the claimant has in fact sustained by the death.' I think " that is a useful sentence. . . . There is, I think, another aspect " of this matter which is very well stated in Redpath v. Belfast " and County Down Railway.[5] That was not a fatal accident " case, though one or two of the fatal accident decisions were " referred to. There had been a railway accident which was " caused by the negligence of the railway company's servant. " A number of people had been killed or injured, and the public " had subscribed to a fund which was used to help those who " had been injured as well as the dependants of those who had " had been killed. The defendants sought to interrogate the " plaintiff as to what payments, if any, he had received from the " fund. The Lord Chief Justice held that that was an irrelevant " matter and could not be brought into account. He said, after " referring to some of the fatal accident cases: ' In these circum- " ' stances common sense and natural justice appear to me to rise " ' in revolt against the proposition that the money so subscribed " ' should be diverted from the objects whom the subscribers " ' intended to benefit in order to be applied in reduction of the " ' damages properly payable by the wrongdoer as compensation " ' to the victims for their loss. Why, one may well ask, should " ' the defendants' burden be lightened by the generosity of the " ' public? ' " Somervell L.J. continued: " I think that one can " say in the same way in this case: why should the burden on the " defendants be lightened by the generosity of the step-children? " I realize, of course, that a defendant may find his or her burden " lightened, for instance, by the fact that the deceased, usually " a husband, has saved money which goes to his wife as a result " of the death."

In the present case it is submitted that the burden upon the defendants, the wrongdoers, should be lightened because the child has a good step-father. Up to a point, that may be right, but it cannot, as I think, be taken that, by reason of the fact that the child has, and for some few years has had, a good step-father, the burden put upon the defendants is removed altogether. They are responsible as tortfeasors, and " in every such action the " jury may give such damages as they may think proportioned " to the injury resulting from such death to the parties respec- " tively for whom and for whose benefit such action shall be " brought." We are concerned with an action brought for the benefit of a very young child. It is admitted that the child was entitled to damages from the defendants in respect of the period from the date of the death of her father up to the remarriage of her mother. The child is a person for whose benefit an action may be brought under section 2 of the Act.

It is submitted by Mr. Russell that no damages ought to be paid in respect of any period after the date of the second marriage. I do not think that it is right to say that no regard should be paid to the fact that the daughter has a step-father who is kind and good to her. It is the duty of the judge assessing damages to pay regard to all relevant facts and, as far as anyone can tell, the child did not suffer any damage between the time of the second marriage of her mother and the date of trial, but it should not be assumed that of necessity the position will remain the same. The defendants admitted that the child was a person entitled to benefit as a person under section 2 of the Act. The remarriage of her mother does not necessarily alter that for all time. In other words, if the defendants are to escape liability after that date, it appears to me that the onus is upon them of showing that in all reasonable probability the child could not suffer any pecuniary loss or damage in the future; in other words, that she is provided for for the rest of the time for which she might have been dependent upon her father.

I do not think that that was shown. One does not know what the future will bring. One hopes that the step-father will continue to be fond of his step-child and to treat her well, and that she will go short of nothing in so far as he can provide it; but there are many things to be considered, and it is not right, as I think, that a child of this age should be cut off from any possibility of damages against a wrongdoer because she has been treated well up to the date of trial. There might be a large family in years to come. The step-father might be pressed for money. He might not be able to look after this child as well as her own father could have done. Those are reasons why it seems to me it is not right to say that she is not entitled to damages after her mother married a second husband.

The judge pointed out that she had lost a father who would be legally bound to maintain her until such time as she could earn her own living. He referred to one or two of the authorities, and said: "There is no actual loss here due to the advent of a "step-father in place of a father. I am asked, however, to "compensate for a prospective loss, and on these grounds: Had "the child's father not been killed, and during some part of the "child's infancy had failed to maintain her, he could have been "made to do so; if the like situation should occur now, the step-"father could not be made to do so. . . . The child is being well "looked after by its step-father, who is very fond of it. The "child has now a half-brother born of the remarriage and the "two are growing up together. There is no evidence that the "step-child is being discriminated against in any way, nor is "there evidence of any prospect of it. The only difference in the "step-child's position is that it now has to rely on the good moral "sense of the step-father to maintain it without any legal sanction "in the background. The step-father has shown every sign of "fulfilling the moral obligation, and it would be wrong and unjust "(and perhaps unfortunate) to suggest that he might cease to do "so in the future."

I do not suggest that he will cease to do the right thing in the future, but there is a difference between a father and a step-father, in that the father can be forced to support his child if he fails to do so, while the step-father cannot. Over and above that, if there is a father as a standby, when the child is getting a little older, the father may well be willing to do something for his own child to help it forward in education or in some other way, a burden which a step-father might not be willing to undertake. I do not accept Mr. Scarman's first proposition. At the same time, I do not consider it was right to say that no damages after the date of the second marriage should be given in respect of the child's claim. How much the damages ought to be is not a simple matter; but, taking all the factors into consideration, I feel that it is right that the claim in respect of the child should be allowed at the sum of £200, and I would allow the appeal accordingly.

JENKINS L.J. I am of the same opinion. In this case the court has to ask itself, and endeavour to answer as at the time of the trial, the question: how much worse off financially is the child Christine than she would have been if her father had not been killed? On making this comparison, one finds on the one hand that Christine lost from the time of her father's death the financial benefits in the form of maintenance, and so forth, which he used to provide for her, but, on the other hand, that Christine's mother had remarried, and that her second husband has so far proved himself to be an excellent step-father, who is maintaining and looking after Christine as though she was his own child.

In this state of affairs Mr. Scarman, for the plaintiff, invites us to hold that all we should have regard to is the loss which Christine has sustained by the death of her father, and not the compensating gain she had received in the shape of an affectionate step-father. Mr. Scarman arrives at that result in this way: He says that injuries on the one hand and benefits on the other are only to be regarded if they are the result of, or the consequence of, the death in question. Here, he says, the marriage, from the point of view of the child, has no causal connexion at all with the accident; that, from the child's point of view, the marriage is irrelevant; it does not give her any rights of maintenance against the step-father. Therefore, he says, to take into account what the child has gained in the form of the prospect of being maintained by the step-father would be doing what was held to be wrong in Peacock v. Amusement Equipment Co. Ltd.[6]; that is to say, lightening the burden of the wrongdoers (namely, the defendants), on the strength of the generosity of the step-father, as it is in this case, or the step-children, as it was in Peacock's case.[6]

In my view, that is not the right way of regarding Christine's acquisition of a step-father. Clearly, if the father had not died, the mother could not have remarried and the child could never have acquired a step-father. She could not have the advantage of being protected by two fathers at one and the same time; so that the financial advantage to her of the protection of the step-father was something that she could not have enjoyed but for the death of her father. In my view, there is a sufficient causal connexion here to make it proper to take into account the financial consequences to the child of the remarriage of her mother.

CLARKE CHAPMAN & CO. LTD.
Jenkins L.J.

Mr. Russell, for the defendants, contended that once the remarriage was taken into account it put an end, a terminus, not only to the claim of the widow in respect of any period after the remarriage but also to the claim of the child Christine in respect of any period after the remarriage. He called our attention to the facts of the case and said that, on those facts, the child was, for all practical purposes, in just as good a financial position as she was before her father's death, owing to the closely comparable circumstances of the father and the step-father, and the step-father's very kind and generous treatment of the child. In my view, that is wrong. However good a step-father this man may be, I do not think it is possible to regard the moral obligation he has chosen to undertake as equivalent to the legal obligation of a father. In these cases one has to consider the financial aspect of the matter; and, so viewing it, I cannot see that the step-father's moral obligation is the financial equivalent of the father's legal obligation. In my view, therefore, the defendants have not shown that the child's injury is fully compensated in the circumstances by an award calculated only in respect of the period from her father's death down to the date of her mother's remarriage, or (to use an expression sometimes met with in these cases) that the child has ceased to be a dependant in consequence of her mother's remarriage. It follows, in my view, that since the contrary has not been proved, the child must be entitled to some further payment in addition to what was awarded to her by the judge, because she was admittedly and indisputably a person falling within section 2 of the Fatal Accidents Act, and it has not been shown that her mother's remarriage has provided a countervailing pecuniary advantage sufficient wholly to offset her loss in respect of any subsequent period.

In these cases it is always difficult to fix on a figure, but I agree with the figure of £200 which I understand my Lord to propose as the whole amount of the damages for the child, and would allow the appeal accordingly.

PARKER L.J. I agree with what my Lords have said and would only add this: The judge came to the conclusion that, on the facts of this case, no reasonable probability of future pecuniary loss had been shown. He said this: "In the present case I "have no evidence of such a prospective pecuniary loss as should "sound in damages for Christine." If, as the judge appears to have assumed, the onus was on the plaintiff, then I agree with his conclusion; but it seems to me that, once a person is shown to be a person for whose benefit an action can be brought under the Act, and is shown to be a person who has suffered a loss of dependency, then the onus shifts. It is then for the defendants to show, if they can, that on the facts of the case the dependency originally lost has been reduced or has ceased entirely. That, as it seems to me, is a heavy onus for the defendants to discharge, when they seek to say that the dependency has entirely ceased. The evidence consisted entirely, on this point, of three or four answers in cross-examination of the widow, passages to which my Lord has referred. Though that is evidence which goes, I think, in reduction of the loss, I cannot think that it is sufficient to enable the defendants to discharge the onus upon them of showing that the loss has entirely ceased. In those circumstances, I agree with the proposed order.

The plaintiff, a boy 10 years of age, was seriously injured by the explosion of petrol fumes from the tank of a disused coach parked near the southern edge of the defendants' parking ground. The petrol had been drained out and a cap screwed onto the entrance pipe. As the plaintiff approached the edge of the parking ground he saw two other small boys standing on the raised edge of the ground and when he was about level with the coach those boys jumped away and immediately the explosion occurred. It was found by the trial judge that the screw cap had been removed that day by someone unknown and that one of the two boys had thrown a lighted match into the tank. He held that there had been no negligence on the part of the defendants and dismissed the action brought by the plaintiff.

The plaintiff appealed, contending, inter alia, that the rule in Rylands v. Fletcher (1868) L.R. 3 H.L. 330 applied, the defendants having kept upon their land, at their peril, a dangerous object likely to do mischief if the fumes from it escaped:—

Held, assuming the rule to apply to personal injuries, that, it having been shown that the escape of the dangerous fumes and the explosion were caused by the acts of a stranger, albeit a child, the defendants came within the exception to the rule in Rylands v. Fletcher, unless the plaintiff could show that the act which caused the escape was of a kind which the defendants could reasonably anticipate and guard against: that this the plaintiff had failed to do, and the appeal failed.

Per Parker L.J. I do not think it open to the Court of Appeal to hold that the rule does not apply to personal injuries.

APPEAL from Lynskey J., sitting at Birmingham Assizes.

The plaintiff, a boy aged 10 years, suing by his father as next friend, brought an action claiming damages for personal injuries against the defendants, Kendricks Transport Ltd.

On October 29, 1952, the boy, Trevor Perry, of Jasmine Road, Dudley, was returning home from school by crossing some waste land and was approaching land used by the defendants as parking ground, when he saw two other small boys standing on a bank at the southern end of the defendants' ground and near the side of a Leyland coach. As Trevor approached them they jumped away and immediately afterwards there was an explosion in the petrol tank of the coach and he was very badly burned and injured.

The defendants, before placing the coach on the parking ground, had emptied the tank of petrol and had screwed a cap on the entrance pipe. According to their evidence there had been a careful and regular inspection of the coaches in the parking ground. There was also evidence that children were accustomed to playing on the coaches, but were chased away by the defendants' employees whenever seen.

Lynskey J., who heard the action on July 26, 1955, found that the cap had been removed by some unknown person and that a lighted match had been thrown into the tank by one of the two boys before Trevor Perry approached them, thereby exploding the petrol fumes. He dismissed the action, holding that there had been no negligence on the part of the defendants and that the rule in Rylands v. Fletcher [1] did not in the circumstances apply.

The plaintiff appealed, and the case is reported only on the question whether the rule in Rylands v. Fletcher applied.

continued: The second way in which the case is put by the plaintiff is that the motor-coach placed upon the defendants' land was something of a kind likely to do mischief if it escaped, or if something from it escaped, and that the defendants, having it upon their land, must keep it and fumes or flames from it upon their land at their peril. The submission is based upon that which is spoken of as the rule in Fletcher v. Rylands.[1] I will read the words of Blackburn J., which were expressly approved in the House of Lords: "We think that the true rule of law is, "that the person who for his own purposes brings on his lands "and collects and keeps there anything likely to do mischief if it "escapes, must keep it in at his peril, and, if he does not do so, "is prima facie answerable for all the damage which is the "natural consequence of its escape."

I assume for this purpose that an action for damages for personal injuries will lie in such a case, and I further assume for this purpose that a motor-coach which had had petrol in the tank is covered by the words "anything likely to do mischief if it "escapes." I suppose that an ordinary person would have thought that the tank or the coach and the tank would be safer if the petrol was removed from the tank than if the petrol was left in the tank, but upon the evidence given by the inspector of the Dudley Fire Brigade it may be said that an empty tank is more dangerous than a full tank, that is, if there has been petrol in it. Upon the evidence of the inspector, Mr. King-Hamilton submitted that here was a dangerous coach, for there might well be an accident through fumes from the tank escaping if the cap was taken off. It appears clear upon the facts, and upon the case put forward by the plaintiff, that there was interference by someone with the coach and with the cap on the top of the tank.

The principle laid down in Fletcher v. Rylands[1] may be avoided or may cease to be applicable if the harm done was due to the act of a stranger. If the mischievous, deliberate and conscious act of a stranger causes the damage, the occupier can escape liability; he is absolved. That is clear from a number of authorities. The one referred to by the judge is Box v. Jubb.[2] I do not cite it directly. It is sufficient if I take a passage from the speech of Lord Moulton in Rickards v. Lothian.[3] Lord Moulton, having referred to Rylands v. Fletcher,[4] said[5]: "Following the language of this judgment their Lordships are of "opinion that no better example could be given of an agent that "the defendant cannot control than that of a third party "surreptitiously and by a malicious act causing the overflow. "The same principle is affirmed in the case of Box v. Jubb.[6] In " that case the defendants had a reservoir on their land which " was connected both for supply and discharge with a watercourse " or main drain. Through the sudden emptying of another " reservoir into the drain at a higher level than their reservoir " and by the blocking of the main drain below, the defendants' " reservoir was made to overflow, and damage was done to the " lands of the plaintiff. The defendants were guilty of no " negligence either in the construction or maintenance of the " reservoir, and the acts which led to its overflow were done by " persons over whom they had no control. In giving judgment " Kelly C.B. says: ' The question is, what was the cause of this " ' overflow? Was it anything for which the defendants are " ' responsible? Did it proceed from their act or default, or from " ' that of a stranger over which they had no control? The case " ' is abundantly clear on this, proving beyond a doubt that the " ' defendants had no control over the causes of the overflow " ' and no knowledge of the existence of the obstruction. The " ' matters complained of took place through no default or breach " ' of duty of the defendants, but were caused by a stranger " ' over whom and at a spot where they had no control. It " ' seems to me to be immaterial whether this is called vis major " ' or the unlawful act of a stranger; it is sufficient to say that " ' the defendants had no means of preventing the occurrence. " ' I think the defendants could not possibly have been expected " ' to anticipate that which happened here, and the law does not " ' require them to construct their reservoir and the sluices and " ' gates leading to it to meet any amount of pressure which the " ' wrongful act of a third person may impose.' Their Lordships " agree with the law as laid down in the judgments above cited, " and are of opinion that a defendant is not liable on the " principle of Fletcher v. Rylands [7] for damage caused by the " wrongful acts of third persons."

In the present case there were two acts which had to happen before the damage could be done. The first was the removal of the cap. By whom that was done there is nothing to show. The second is the throwing into the tank of a lighted match which immediately brought about flames and which caused injury to this young boy. The two boys who were near the plaintiff, and who were up against the coach as he approached, were about the same age as the plaintiff, about 10 years old. It is submitted by Mr. King-Hamilton that, in view of their age, they cannot have been capable of a deliberate or conscious act, and Mr. Burke, who followed, put this general proposition, that children are incapable of deliberate volition. That submission was sought to be reinforced by the reading of a passage from the speech of Lord Atkinson in Cooke v. Midland Great Western Railway of Ireland.[8] I do not propose to read the passage. I do not think that it affects anything which has to be decided in this case.

The way in which Mr. King-Hamilton seeks to use it is this: the defendants knew, said he, that boys played on their parking ground; they knew that coaches were an attraction to them; a coach ought to be regarded as an allurement; and thus the defendants ought to have anticipated any action of any kind on the part of those boys of 10 years of age, and they ought to have guarded against it.

I regard that as placing much too high a duty upon the occupiers of property. I am prepared to accept this position. If the person who interferes with something of the defendants is a person whom they might expect to be upon their ground, and if the character of the interference is something which they ought to anticipate, then they do owe some duty. The measure of that duty depends upon the circumstances, the nature of the object, and the age of the children. I do not think that it can extend to that which happened in this case. Someone removed the cap. Someone threw the lighted match into the tank. There is no evidence to show that either of those things ought to be anticipated. If it is said that because boys pass through a parking ground there is a duty on the owner of the vehicle or the occupier of the parking ground who has a vehicle there to see that the cap is not removed from the petrol tank, in other words, to lock by a padlock or otherwise the cap, that is something new, in my view. I do not know the basis on which it can be said that the occupier must anticipate that kind of thing: still less do I think that the occupier ought to anticipate that a boy of 10 would throw a lighted match into the tank. There is nothing to show that it has ever been done before and I hope it will never be done again. A boy of 10 years of age knows that it is wrong. He knows that he is asking for trouble if he does it. That, I think, is shown by the fact that both boys jumped back. The match was thrown into the tank mischievously and deliberately. It cannot be said that it was something which the defendants ought to have anticipated, and it was the act of one who was not under their control in any sense. He was a stranger.

Lynskey J. gave judgment for the defendants, having considered both aspects of the case, and in that I think he was right, and the appeal, therefore, should be dismissed.

JENKINS L.J. I agree. So far as the plaintiff's claim is founded on negligence it seems to me that he has wholly failed to make out his case. As the trial judge found, the defendants did all that could reasonably be expected of them to prevent children meddling with the disused motor-coach. The happening which brought about the accident was one which the defendants could not reasonably have been expected to foresee.

As to the alternative contentions that the defendants are liable, even if they were not negligent, on the principle of Rylands v. Fletcher,[9] I am prepared to accept the view that this motor-coach, in the condition in which it was on the defendants' land, was an object of the class to which the rule in Rylands v. Fletcher[9] applies, that is to say, that it was for this purpose a dangerous thing, so that the defendants were under an obligation under the rule to prevent it, or the dangerous element in it, escaping on to a neighbour's land and doing damage there. It was a dangerous thing for this purpose in that its tank contained inflammable petrol vapour. But the fact that it was a thing to which the rule in Rylands v. Fletcher[9] applied, and the fact that the vapour escaped and was ignited and did damage, cannot conclude the matter against the defendants, because, as is well settled, an occupant of land cannot be held liable under the rule if the act bringing about the escape was the act of a stranger, and not any act or omission of the occupier himself or his servant or agent, or any defect, latent or patent, in the arrangements made for keeping the dangerous thing under control. In this case, it seems to me plain that the escape was caused by the act of a stranger or strangers in the shape of one or both of the two small boys Whittaker and Rawlinson.

Mr. King-Hamilton submitted that a child cannot for this purpose be a stranger because ability should not be imputed to a child of doing a conscious and deliberate act when he does such a thing as setting fire to petrol vapour in the tank of a vehicle. Speaking for myself, I see no necessity to confine the exception from the rule in Rylands v. Fletcher[9] of acts of strangers to acts which proceed from the conscious volition or the deliberate act of the stranger. It seems to me that the relevance of the exception is that the stranger is regarded as a person over whose acts the occupier of the land has no control. Then the real cause of the escape is not the occupier's action in having the dangerous thing on his land: nor is it any failure on his part, or on the part of his agents, in keeping the dangerous thing on the land: nor is it due to any latent or patent defect in his protective measures. The real cause is none of these things. The real cause is the act of the stranger, for whose acts the occupier of the land is in no sense responsible, because he cannot control them.

If I may be allowed to cite a further passage in addition to those my Lord has read, it is interesting in this connexion to observe that in Rickards v. Lothian[10] Lord Moulton, after referring to the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Nicols v. Marsland,[11] continued: "To follow the language of the judgment "just recited—a defendant cannot in their Lordships opinion be "properly said to have caused or allowed the water to escape if "the malicious act of a third person was the real cause of its "escaping without any fault on the part of the defendant. It is "remarkable that the very point involved in the present case

" was expressly dealt with by Bramwell B. in delivering the " judgment of the Court of Exchequer in the same case. He " says: ' What has the defendant done wrong? What right of " ' the plaintiff has she infringed? She has done nothing wrong. " ' She has infringed no right. It is not the defendant who let " ' loose the water and sent it to destroy the bridges. She did " ' indeed store it, and store it in such quantities that if it was " ' let loose it would do as it did, mischief. But suppose a " ' stranger let it loose, would the defendant be liable? If so, " ' then if a mischievous boy bored a hole in a cistern in any " ' London house, and the water did mischief to a neighbour, " ' the occupier of the house would be liable. That cannot be. " ' Then why is the defendant liable if some agent over which " ' she has no control lets the water out? . . . I admit that it is " ' not a question of negligence. A man may use all care to keep " ' the water in . . . but would be liable if through any defect, " ' though latent, the water escaped. . . . But here the act is " ' that of an agent he cannot control.' "

There Baron Bramwell gives, by way of reductio ad absurdum, the example of a mischievous boy boring a hole in a cistern. He says that if the defendant in Nicols v. Marsland [11] was liable, then the occupier of a house in which there was a cistern, if a mischievous boy bored a hole in it, would be liable, and adds " that cannot be." If we are to accept Mr. King-Hamilton's argument on this point in its full form, then if any mischievous boy chose to come on the defendants' land and chose to set fire to the petrol or the petrol vapour in the tank of a vehicle there, the defendants would be liable. I repeat, with Baron Bramwell, " that cannot be."

It seems to me that this argument must be limited to saying that in the circumstances of a particular case it may be that children doing some mischievous act whereby the dangerous thing escapes are not strangers, but I cannot regard that as aiding a plaintiff in an action such as this, unless it can be shown that in the circumstances of the case the dangerous thing was left by the defendants in such a condition that it was a reasonable and probable consequence of their action, which they ought to have foreseen, that children might meddle with the dangerous thing and cause it to escape. If facts such as those were made out in any particular case, then, in my view, the defendants could not claim to rely on the act of the mischievous child as constituting the act of a stranger. It would be an act brought about by the defendants' own negligence in dealing with the dangerous thing, and the consequence, which they should have foreseen, of a negligent act. But if that is made out, then one reaches the point where the claim based on Rylands v. Fletcher [12] merges into the claim in negligence: for if such a state of affairs could be made out, then it would no longer be necessary for the plaintiff to rely on Rylands v. Fletcher [12] at all. He could rely simply on the defendants' negligence. But Mr. King-Hamilton is precluded from taking that course here by the circumstance that the judge, in my view rightly, held that there was no negligence on the part of the defendants.

Accordingly, while I feel great sympathy for this unfortunate infant plaintiff, who has sustained very serious injuries through no fault of his own, I have come to the conclusion that no ground has been shown upon which this court could properly hold the defendants liable to compensate him for his hurts. I agree that this appeal must be dismissed.

PARKER L.J. I agree, and I would only add a word in deference to Mr. King-Hamilton's argument on his submission in regard to the rule in Rylands v. Fletcher.[12] Though the decision in Musgrove v. Pandelis [13] has been the subject of some criticism (see the speech of Lord Porter in Read v. J. Lyons & Co. Ltd.[14]), it is still binding upon this court. Accordingly, I feel bound to approach the matter upon the basis that the facts here bring the case within the rule in Rylands v. Fletcher [15]: nor do I think it is open to this court to hold that the rule only applies to damage to adjoining land or to a proprietary interest in land and not to personal injury. It is true that in Read v. Lyons & Co. Ltd.[16] Lord Macmillan, Lord Porter and Lord Simonds all doubted whether the rule extended to cover personal injuries, but the final decision in the matter was expressly left over and, as the matter stands at present, I think we are bound to hold that the defendants are liable in this case, quite apart from negligence, unless they can bring themselves within one of the well-known exceptions to the rule.

It has for a long time been an exception to the rule if the defendants can show that the act which brought about the escape was the act of a stranger, meaning thereby, someone over whom they had no control. The acts in question here, firstly, of removing the petrol cap, and, secondly, of inserting a lighted match, are, as it seems to me, prima facie undoubtedly the acts of strangers in that sense. Mr. King-Hamilton, however, contends that, nevertheless, since at any rate the last of those acts, the insertion of the lighted match, was almost certainly the act of a young child, the exception does not apply, and for this reason, so he says, that in law the act of a young child is not a novus actus interveniens. Speaking for myself, I do not think the matter can be approached in quite that way. In a Rylands v. Fletcher [17] case the plaintiff need only prove the escape. The onus is then on the defendants to bring themselves within one of the exceptions. Once they prove that the escape was caused by the act of a stranger, whether an adult or a child, they escape liability, unless the plaintiff can go on to show that the act which caused the escape was an act of the kind which the occupier could reasonably have anticipated and guarded against. In that connexion it seems to me that it is not sufficient for the plaintiff to show that the defendants knew that children played in the vehicle park, played on the roof of a motor or inside a coach. They must show that the defendants reasonably should have anticipated an act of a kind which would cause the escape.

Sorry as one is for the infant plaintiff in this case, it seems to me that he has utterly failed to show that the defendants should have anticipated any such thing. I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

PRACTICE NOTE.

Husband and Wife — Divorce — Practice — Decree — Form of decree — Naming parties found guilty of adultery.

APPLICATION (by successful party) to amend decree nisi of divorce.

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment. On November 9, 1955, the commissioner found the wife petitioner, who did not proceed with her case but against whom the husband had charged adultery, guilty of adultery with three men, whose names were Hekner, Denester and Niekrasz. Hekner was dismissed from the suit as there was no evidence against him, the wife's confession being evidence only against herself. Denester and Niekrasz were found guilty of adultery with the wife petitioner. An order for the husband's costs was made against Denester only, and not against Niekrasz.

According to the accustomed practice over many years the order for the decree nisi was drawn up so as to name only Denester as the party cited guilty of adultery, as he was the only party cited who had been ordered to pay costs.

MILLER (FORMERLY KOZUBOWSKI) v. KOZUBOWSKI.

Norman Lermon, for the husband, applied for a correction of the order so that it should be recorded therein that the wife had committed adultery with each of the three men cited in accordance with the commissioner's finding against her.

The wife did not appear and was not represented on the application, which was unopposed.

Cur. adv. vult.

MR. COMMISSIONER LATEY Q.C. said that he would grant an order on the application. After stating the facts substantially as set out above, the commissioner continued: On consideration of this somewhat technical matter I have decided that properly the order should be drawn up so as to record therein the fact that the wife was guilty of adultery with Denester and Niekrasz. I understand that you agree and that that will accord with your requirements?

Lermon. Yes, my Lord.

MR. COMMISSIONER LATEY Q.C. A direction under date December 6, 1955, has now been issued by the senior registrar as follows: "Where there is a specific finding of adultery against "a co-respondent or second respondent"—and, of course, the same thing applies to parties cited—"the name should appear "in the statement of the ground for divorce in the decree "('So and so had been guilty of adultery with A.B. the "'co-respondent'), whether or no there is any order for costs." The order as now drawn reads: ". . . be dissolved by reason "that since the celebration thereof the petitioner has been guilty "of adultery with Denester, the second party cited, and with "Niekrasz, the third party cited, and they with the said "petitioner."

Order accordingly.

* KEEBLE v. KEEBLE.

Mr. Commissioner Latey Q.C.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Separation agreement—Covenant not to institute proceedings for restitution of conjugal rights "or otherwise"—No bar to proceedings for divorce.

Ejusdem generis rule.

As a result of conduct of his wife which formed the basis of a divorce petition in 1955, the husband left the matrimonial home in 1953. By a separation agreement of August, 1953, in which no misconduct was alleged, the husband made financial provision for the wife and the parties covenanted not to institute any proceedings against each other "for restitution of conjugal rights or otherwise." It was further agreed that the financial provision for the wife should cease to be payable on a dissolution of the marriage.

At the hearing of the husband's petition it was submitted for the wife that the words "or otherwise" constituted a bar to proceedings for divorce:—

Held, that, the ejusdem generis principle must be applied to the words "or otherwise." As the whole purpose of the agreement was to separate the parties on terms which excluded any reference to misconduct, those words meant that neither by a process for restitution of conjugal rights nor in any other possible way could legal steps be taken by either party to compel the other to come together. The wider meaning sought to be put upon them was excluded by the fact that the possibility of a future divorce had been taken into consideration in the agreement, and the words, therefore, constituted no bar to proceedings for divorce.

HUSBAND'S DEFENDED PETITION for divorce on the ground of cruelty.

The parties were married on January 9, 1926. As a result of the wife's alleged conduct dating from 1938, which was eventually the basis of the charge of cruelty, the husband left home in 1953, and consulted solicitors. Correspondence then ensued between the husband's solicitors and those consulted by the wife in which no allegations of cruelty nor any other form of matrimonial misconduct were made against the wife.

On August 1, 1953, the parties entered into a separation agreement by which in clause 1 they agreed that "the husband and "the wife shall live and continue to live separate and apart from "each other and neither shall molest annoy or interfere with each "other or institute any proceedings for restitution of conjugal "rights or otherwise." By clause 2 it was agreed that the husband should pay to the wife for life a sum of £3 a week net, but that such sum "shall cease to be payable if the marriage "between the husband and the wife shall be dissolved by a final "or absolute decree of a court of competent jurisdiction." Clause 10 of the agreement provided that the agreement should cease to have effect on a resumption of cohabitation. The agreement made no allegation of misconduct against the wife. The husband, in his evidence in the divorce suit, said that at the time of entering into the agreement all that he had in his mind was to get away from a position which had become intolerable to him.

On March 3, 1955, the husband filed his petition praying for a dissolution of the marriage on the ground of cruelty; the wife, by her answer, denied the allegations of cruelty.

At the hearing of the petition counsel for the wife submitted that the words "or otherwise" contained in clause 1 of the agreement of August 1, 1953, were a bar to the proceedings.

Rudolph Castle-Miller for the husband.
A. E. Bolton for the wife.

The cases cited in argument are referred to in the judgment.

KEEBLE v. KEEBLE.

MR. COMMISSIONER LATEY Q.C. stated the facts and continued: It is submitted on behalf of the wife that the words "or "otherwise" in the separation agreement bar this petition. I have been referred to the well-known and somewhat antique case of Rowley v. Rowley,[1] in which the wife sued for dissolution of marriage on the joint grounds of her husband's cruelty and adultery; that was not proceeded with on terms that the parties should execute a deed of separation, and the wife's undertaking not to institute other proceedings in the Divorce Court. Notwithstanding that undertaking, the wife petitioned afresh for divorce, alleging the old charges of cruelty, and new charges of adultery. One has to recall that as the law then stood a wife could obtain a divorce only by proving cruelty or desertion, coupled with adultery, apart from exceptional grounds which it is not necessary to mention. But in that case there were plain unambiguous words which Lord Chelmsford L.C. construed [2] as intended to prevent "future proceedings in respect of matters forming the ground of "a petition for a divorce which had occurred prior to the agree-"ment," so the petition was dismissed upon the exact language that the parties used in the agreement, as was pointed out by Sir Wilfred Greene M.R. in Goldblum v. Goldblum.[3] In the latter case, which was relied upon by Mr. Castle-Miller on behalf of the husband, the wife's suit for judicial separation was compromised by a deed of separation, providing that the petition should be dismissed, but it contained no express provision that the charges of cruelty in that petition should be withdrawn. The Court of Appeal there held that on the true construction of the deed the wife had not undertaken to withdraw the charges, nor had she undertaken not to use them in subsequent divorce proceedings; therefore, the petition was heard and tried.

Mr. Bolton relied upon H—. v. H—.[4] In that case, the wife had petitioned for divorce and it was submitted that she was barred by her withdrawal of charges of cruelty which had been made in a previous petition by her for judicial separation, those charges being withdrawn specifically in a deed of separation which compromised that petition. It was there held by Lord Merriman P. that as she had withdrawn the charges, she could not go on with them in the later petition. Lord Merriman P. reviewed [5] the leading cases on this particular subject, including Rowley v. Rowley [6] (to which I have already referred), Rose v. Rose,[7] a case which generated the well-known and comprehensive Rose v. Rose clause, and L. v. L.,[8] in which Lord Merrivale P. held that the husband's covenant in a deed of separation not to charge adultery committed before the deed was binding on him and, therefore, the husband was debarred from raising such charges later.

It should be noted that in the present case, in the correspondence between the solicitors leading up to the agreement there was no allegation of cruelty and no allegation of any other form of matrimonial misconduct; and the husband in his evidence told me that all that he had in his mind was to get away from a position which had become intolerable to him, that he had thus entered into this agreement to separate, and that he had no intention of going back on it.

Now, Mr. Bolton contended, and it was a very able submission that he made, that the words "or otherwise" meant that the husband could bring no civil proceedings against the wife at all, and, in support of that contention, he cited two cases in which the words "or otherwise" had, in his view, been decided on the lines he maintained.

I ought now to recall the exact words of clause 1 of the agreement in the present case: "The husband and the wife shall "live and continue to live separate and apart from each other "and neither of them shall molest annoy or interfere with the "other"—and these are the words that are relevant to the present judgment—"or institute any proceedings for restitution "of conjugal rights or otherwise."

Of course, there are any number of cases, scores and scores of them, on the meaning of the words "or otherwise," or "or "other" in the authorities, and Mr. Bolton put before me two of them. I am afraid that neither of them assisted me very much, owing to their peculiar context, but it is only fair to pay tribute to Mr. Bolton's submission by dealing with them. In one of them, Whittaker v. Kershaw,[9] it was a question of whether a married woman could be sued by an executor having regard to the words of section 1 (2) of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. That section reads: "A married woman shall be capable of "entering into and rendering herself liable in respect of and to the "extent of her separate property on any contract, and of suing "and being sued, either in contract or in tort, or otherwise, in "all respects as if she were a feme sole." The Court of Appeal in that case applied the well-established principle of ejusdem generis, that is to say, that where general words follow particular ones, the rule is to construe the general words as meaning "other such like." Applying that principle to the words "or "otherwise," the Court of Appeal held that the genus was the status of feme sole in which capacity she could be sued. In the other case cited by Mr. Bolton, the National Association of Local Government Officers v. Bolton Corporation,[10] the question arose from the statutory definition of a "workman" as "any person "who . . . works under a contract with an employer, whether "the contract be by way of manual labour, clerical work or otherwise." Here the House of Lords had to construe the meaning of words in a statutory order, and Lord Simon said [11] that the use of the words "or otherwise" did not bring into play the ejusdem generis principle because "manual labour" and "clerical work" did not belong to a single limited genus. He held that "or otherwise" meant "or in any other way."

Those cases did not seem to assist me in the context of the present case. Clearly the ejusdem generis principle must be applied to the present case if the words "or otherwise" are no more than empty surplusage. The whole purpose of the deed was to separate the parties on terms which excluded any reference to matrimonial misconduct of any kind. If I am compelled to give a meaning to the words "or otherwise," I have concluded (a) that the genus being the separation of the husband and wife, those words mean that neither by a process for restitution of conjugal rights, nor in any other possible way, could legal steps be taken by either party to compel the other to come together; and (b), that the very much wider meaning sought to be put on those words is excluded by the fact that in clause 2 the possibility of a divorce in the future is taken into consideration. Therefore, I find that this petition is not barred by those words in the deed, and that there is no estoppel.

[His Lordship then proceeded to review the facts upon which the husband's allegations of cruelty were based, holding that acts of cruelty before January, 1953, had been condoned but had been revived by subsequent acts of cruelty; and pronounced a decree nisi.]

[1954 S. No. 1395.]

Negligence—Safe system of work—Dangerous premises—Coal mine—Unsafe roof in mine—Employers undertaking work under contract with occupiers of mine—Breach of statutory duty by occupiers—Accident to employee—Liability of employers.

The plaintiff's employers, A. T. C., were engaged under contract with the National Coal Board, the occupiers of a mine, in constructing a tunnel in the mine when some controversy arose as to the manner in which the roof should be supported. The supervisor of A. T. C. wished to employ a system of support which he was prohibited from using by the officials of the Board, who laid down a system of support which was less adequate. The controversy was reported to a senior official of A. T. C., who conveyed the substance of it to a senior official of the Board, as a result of which nothing further was done and the plaintiff, although he complained to his superiors, was instructed to carry on with the system of support laid down by the officials of the Board. While so working the plaintiff sustained injuries by a fall of the roof, which was due to its being, in breach of the statutory duty imposed on the Board, insufficiently supported:—

Held, dismissing the plaintiff's claim against his employers, that, in the circumstances, the employers, even though they were aware of the situation, were not in breach of their common law duty to take reasonable care to provide a safe system of work for the plaintiff.

ACTION.

The plaintiff, Jan Szumczyk, was employed by the first defendants, Associated Tunnelling Co. Ltd., who were engaged under contract with the second defendants, the National Coal Board, in constructing a tunnel in a mine owned and occupied by the Board. In the course of some eight or nine months the tunnel had been driven a distance of about 1,000 yards, and in August, 1953, had reached a point where it made a junction with an old airway. Because of the risk of fire, instructions were given by the second defendants that all the old timber supports should be removed from the old airway. As the tunnel was driven further, the old airway and the increasing space between it and the tunnel had to be packed and the roof had to be supported while such packing proceeded. The difficulty of supporting the intervening space was increased by the presence of a stump of ungot coal and two schools of thought arose as to the manner of meeting the situation. The first defendants' supervisor, Chester, contended that substantial support in the form of chocks and "goalposts" was necessary. The officials of the second defendants maintained that single or self props were enough to carry the weight provided an adequate number were set. The support afforded by "goalposts" would have been greater than the individual support afforded by props alone.

When the old airway was first encountered, Chester started working in accordance with his own method, putting in the supports he wanted and leaving the old timber in position; he was then ordered to remove the old timber and while doing so there was a fall of dirt. He informed the under-manager of the Board, Houghton, of the danger involved, but was ordered to continue to remove the old timber. Chester was subsequently ordered by the Board's officials to remove some chocks and "goalposts" which he had set up, and he was prohibited from using the system of support he wished to employ. The controversy was reported by Chester to the first defendants' senior official, Major Greenhalgh, who took the matter up with the manager of the mine, Whincup, but nothing further was done and Chester was told by Major Greenhalgh to carry on in accordance with the instructions given by the Board's officials.

On September 23, 1953, the plaintiff was engaged, in the course of his employment, in packing the old airway and getting out some coal when a stone fell from the roof and he sustained injuries. The plaintiff had worked at this place for only three or four days before his accident and in that time had formed an adverse view of the method of working and had said so to his superiors, but he was told by Chester and by his chargehand that he must carry on.

The plaintiff brought this action claiming damages against the first defendants on the ground of negligence and against the Board on the ground of negligence and/or breach of section 49 of the Coal Mines Act, 1911. Ashworth J. found that the fall of the roof was due to its being insufficiently supported, which was conceded on behalf of the Board to be sufficient of itself to render them liable for breach of their statutory duty, their attempt to show that it was not reasonably practicable to avoid or prevent the breach being abandoned. The judge also found that had the roof been supported in the manner advocated by Chester, it was likely that it would not have fallen and the prohibition by the Board of the use of that method of support played a direct and important part in causing the fall.

D. J. Brabin Q.C. and J. M. Davies for the first defendants.

J. D. R. Crichton Q.C. and Leslie S. Rigg for the National Coal Board.

The following cases, not referred to in the judgment, were cited in argument: Wilsons and Clyde Coal Co. v. English[1]; Garcia v. Harland & Wolff Ltd.[2]; Bott v. Protheroe Steel Tube Co. Ltd.; L. Dainty Ltd., Third Parties.[3]

ASHWORTH J. stated the facts and continued: On my findings up to this stage it is clear that the Coal Board must bear a major responsibility for this accident, but it is still said that the tunnelling company are partly responsible, and the attack on that company, both by the Coal Board and by the plaintiff, has been pursued right to the end. It is not quite the same attack.

Mr. Crichton, for the Coal Board, sought to assign the blame to Chester. The way he put it was that Chester should have been more emphatic with Major Greenhalgh and the latter with Mr. Whincup. I have no doubt whatever that Chester did report to Major Greenhalgh to the following effect: first, that there was trouble in the area of operation and that two views were in conflict; secondly, that the trouble related primarily to the removal of the old timber in the airway; thirdly, that the trouble related generally to the safety of the conditions down there; and fourthly, that the Coal Board would not let him carry on by the method which he wanted. I am also satisfied that Major Greenhalgh conveyed the substance of the first three of those complaints to Mr. Whincup. I do not think that it would be right to say that Major Greenhalgh made it plain to Mr. Whincup that the Coal Board had issued any prohibition against the method which Chester wished to adopt as regards chocks and "goalposts," but I am quite satisfied that Major Greenhalgh himself was aware that safety was involved; trouble had arisen, and he passed on the substance of that to Mr. Whincup. I find it myself somewhat ironical that the Coal Board, after insisting on having their way, should now complain that someone made insufficient protest to persuade them to change their minds. If Chester had done nothing it may be that there would be some substance in this complaint by the Coal Board, but I take the view that he acted reasonably and understandably, and that Major Greenhalgh also acted reasonably and understandably. It was put up to high level, which Mr. Crichton demanded, and if as a result of what Major Greenhalgh said to Mr. Whincup nothing was done, I do not think the fault lies with Major Greenhalgh. I therefore reject the contention of the Coal Board that the tunnelling company was to blame on the ground suggested.

Mr. Watson, for the plaintiff, took a quite different line, and understandably so. For the plaintiff he said that the tunnelling company, as his employers, were under a duty to take reasonable care to provide a safe system of work and that the tunnelling company could not escape from the consequence of the system being unsafe by saying that they relied on the Coal Board. He referred to the authority which laid down that it is not enough to rely on the provision of a competent foreman, and he cited to me a passage from the speech of Lord Wright in Thomson v. Cremin[1]: "To hold a master stevedore, in the absence of special "circumstances of suspicion, subject to a general duty towards "his men to inspect the structure of the vessel, whether per- "manent or temporary, whether shifting-boards, stanchions or "the like, would, I think, be contrary to practice and inconsistent "with the exigencies of the case. He comes on board the vessel, "the shipowner's premises, to carry out the loading or dis- "charging, and, unless there are special stipulations in the "contract, is prima facie entitled to assume that the shipowner "has discharged his duty of care in regard to the safety of the "premises. He is on board the ship for a special and limited "purpose and has in the ordinary course no right to interfere "with the structure, temporary or permanent, of the vessel. "No doubt, if there are apparent indications which he observes, "or ought to observe, that the structure is defective, he owes a "duty to take reasonable measures for the protection of his men. "But there was nothing of the sort in the present case. I agree "generally with what was said on this question by the Lord "Justice-Clerk (Rt. Hon. J. H. A. Macdonald) in M'Lachlan "v. Peverill S.S. Co. Ltd.,[2] though, if there was something "manifestly wrong and dangerous, I think the stevedore should "refuse to go on with the work until the defect was remedied."

It must be kept in mind that the employers' duty is to take reasonable care. It is not an absolute duty, as has been laid down in many cases. I ask myself whether the tunnelling company took reasonable care to provide a safe system of work. No authority precisely covering the present point has been cited, but there were sentences in the extract from Lord Wright's speech which dealt with premises which lead me to a conclusion in favour of the tunnelling company. I take the view that the tunnelling company were aware, as they must have been aware, that the Coal Board were under a statutory duty regarding the support of the roof. The tunnelling company knew that there was a controversy as to the method of support. They reported the controversy, they knew the Coal Board were experts, and even though the method proved wrong I am prepared to hold that the tunnelling company were not in breach of their duty to the plaintiff in what they did.

It seems to me that in a case of this sort one has on the one hand the Coal Board under a statutory duty which is almost absolute to take steps for the support of the roof. The Coal Board said to the relevant witnesses that their method of support was the one which was adequate; not merely adequate, but the one which must be employed. I ask myself whether it is right to hold that the tunnelling company, who were aware of that situation, were in breach of their duty because they followed the advice of the Coal Board and instructed their men to do what those charged with the statutory duty were insisting on being done, and I answer that question "No." Quite clearly the tunnelling company could not insist on Chester's method, and short of withdrawing their men, which in the circumstances was not suggested as being incumbent on them, there was nothing more, in my view, which they ought to have done which they omitted to do. I am therefore prepared to hold, and I do hold, that this claim fails against the tunnelling company.

* THOMSON v. CREMIN AND OTHERS.

H. L. (Sc.)

July 14, 15, 17, 18, 22, 23, 24; Oct. 20.

Invitor and Invitee — Independent contractor — Negligence of—Ship—Injury to stevedore's labourer—Third party's negligence—Fall of "shore" fixed by Australian shipwrights in accordance with Australian regulations—Stevedores' duty to inspect ship—Liability of shipowner or employing stevedores.
Negligence—Safe system of work—Dangerous premises.

A labourer, employed by a firm of Glasgow stevedores, in discharging bulk grain in a ship's hold, was injured when he was struck by the fall of a "shore" fixed by shipwrights in Australia to hold a shifting-board and certified as satisfying Australian Government regulations:—

Held, first, that compliance with the regulations (which were concerned with securing the safety of the ship and cargo from the dangers of the voyage) was not the full extent of the shipowner's duty to the labourer as an invitee, that duty being to take adequate care and, if such care was not taken in fixing the shore, the shipowner was not exonerated by the fact of having employed an independent contractor.

Wilkinson v. Rea Ltd. [1941] 1 K.B. 688; [1941] 2 All E.R. 50, approved.

Held, secondly, that there was evidence on which the courts below could find, as they did, that the shore was fixed without adequate care.

Held, thirdly, that on the evidence negligence on the part of the firm of stevedores was not established, since it was not proved to be part of the regular practice of such firms to inspect the shores and unless they observed a defect in a particular shore they were not obliged to take special precautions.

Held, lastly, that the shipowner was accordingly liable in damages.

Decision of the Second Division of the Court of Session affirmed.

APPEAL from the Second Division of the Court of Session.

The first respondent in this case, Joseph Cremin, received serious injuries while employed as a stevedore's labourer by the second respondents, Andrew Main & Sons, in discharging bulk grain from No. 2 hold of the S.S. Sithonia belonging to the appellant, Henry Murray Thomson, which was lying in Princes Dock, Glasgow. This respondent raised an action in the first instance against the appellant and, on the appellant attributing the accident to the fault and negligence of the second-named respondents, he convened them as defenders in the action and sued the appellant and the second-named respondents jointly and severally for damages in respect of the injuries which he had sustained.

The facts are fully set out in the opinion of Viscount Simon L.C.

A. P. Duffes K.C. and George Reid for the appellant.
John Wheatley and G. G. Stott for the first respondent.
G. R. Thomson K.C. and J. H. Bassett for the second respondents.

The House intimated that the appeal would be dismissed and their Lordships took time to formulate their reasons.

Oct. 20. VISCOUNT SIMON L.C. My Lords, on April 29. 1938, the first respondent, Joseph Cremin, who was pursuer in the action, received serious injuries while employed by the second-named respondents as a stevedore's labourer in discharging bulk grain from No. 2 hold of the S.S. Sithonia, belonging to the appellant, which was lying in Princes Dock, Glasgow, after a voyage from Fremantle in Western Australia. A heavy wooden "shore" which stretched from the ship's side to the "shifting-board" fell upon the pursuer's head while he was below propelling a grain "plough," which was being used for feeding the buckets of an elevator working from No. 2 hold to the main deck. The pursuer in the first instance brought his action against the appellant alone, alleging that, owing to the negligence of the appellant, the shore was insecurely attached to the shifting-board. Upon the appellant attributing the accident to the negligence of the second-named respondents, the pursuer added them as defenders in the action and sued the appellant and the second-named respondents jointly and severally for damages in respect of the injuries which he had sustained.

The Lord Ordinary (Lord Robertson) reached the conclusion that the appellant's negligence was established, and that he was liable to compensate the pursuer in the sum of £1,350. As against the master stevedores, the Lord Ordinary held that negligence was not proved and he accordingly assoilzied the second-named respondents.

The present appellant appealed to the Second Division of the Court of Session, contending either that the second-named respondents were solely responsible, or at any rate that the responsibility should be shared between them. The Inner House affirmed the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary. Lord Mackay, however, would have preferred a finding of joint responsibility, and there are indications that other of the judges composing the court did not in all respects agree with the mode of reasoning by which the Lord Ordinary reached his conclusion.

The case for the appellant before this House was again stated alternatively, his contentions being (a) that there was no failure of duty by him towards the injured man but that the sole responsibility lay on the second-named respondents; (b) that, in any event, if liability was established against the appellant, fault causing the accident was also proved against the second-named respondents. This double-barrelled case was presented to us in an argument which thoroughly examined every detail of the evidence, but the House intimated that the decision already reached by the courts in Scotland must stand, for reasons which would be given later. I have now to state, with such brevity as the subject-matter permits of, what are the reasons why I consider that the appeal should be dismissed.

The holds of a vessel which is about to undertake a voyage with grain in bulk as its cargo require to be fitted with "shifting-boards," i.e., wooden partitions running fore and aft from bulkhead to bulkhead in the centre line of the ship, so as to obviate the danger of the grain shifting in heavy weather from one side to the other. These shifting-boards are for the most part supported in position by attachment to the permanent iron pillars which are fixed at intervals inside the holds; but, in the way of the hatch, lateral support for the shifting-board is provided by "shores"—short shores stretching from the hatch coamings (with these we are not in this case directly concerned) and long shores stretching from either side of the ship at a rising angle of about 10 degrees from the horizontal. These long shores in the case of the Sithonia were about 27 feet long with a scantling of 6 in. by 8 in., and these dimensions were not challenged as inadequate.

Since the long shores meet the uprights of the shifting-boards at a slope, it is important that their midship ends should be cut at such an angle as will present a flat surface for making contact with the perpendicular. The Lord Ordinary held, and the fact may be accepted, that this was done in the case of the Sithonia. But it is not enough that the midship ends of the long shores should be suitably shaped, or even that the shores should be pressed down so as to make solid contact; they must be so held in position as to make sure that they will remain firm. There was some difference of view as to what additional precautions were needed, but the evidence fully warranted the Lord Ordinary's conclusion that a safe construction would be provided by (1) securely nailing and (2) fitting a "chock" or "cleat" of wood above the midships end of the shore by nailing it with 5 inch by 5 gauge nails driven through it into the upright, and thus counteracting any upward thrust of the midships end of the shore. Indeed, I understand the appellant to accept this standard. His argument on the facts was directed to establishing (a) that the shore which fell on the pursuer was securely fixed in Australia in accordance with the above construction; (b) that its fall was not due to any default in the shipowner, but was caused by the negligent operations of the second-named respondents while discharging the cargo under contract with the appellant.

As regards (a) the testimony was conflicting. The appellant relied on the evidence of three witnesses taken in Australia, where Messrs. Petterson & Co., a firm of shipwrights with a large experience of fitting grain ships with shifting-boards, were employed for this purpose on the Sithonia in preparation for her taking on board her cargo. The partner in this firm who supervised the work gave evidence that the construction above described was duly carried out; a marine surveyor who inspected and certified the work for an underwriting association testified that the structure was properly executed—(the Lord Ordinary notes that he did not state that the inboard ends of the shores were secured by nails, but, on the other hand, he declared that he would not expect the shore to be dislodged by less than repeated blows with a sledge hammer)—and a Government inspector who gave the official certificate spoke more generally of the shifting-boards being efficiently fitted. As against this, there is the fact that, after the shore was exposed by the removal of the grain in which it was embedded during the voyage the shore fell, and fell without the application of any violence corresponding to sledge-hammer blows; and, according to the evidence of three fellow-workmen of the pursuer who were in the hold when it fell, the "chock" which should have helped to keep the shore in position became detached and fell also, when it was observed that the nails in it, instead of being 5 inches long, were short nails of about 2½ inches. The details of Messrs. Petterson's bill show that a quantity of 3 inch nails were charged for in the course of the work, but no evidence was given as to the purpose for which they were used.

The erection of the shifting-boards, and the fitting of shores to

THOMSON v. CREMIN.
Viscount Simon L.C.

support them, were required by regulations made under the Navigation Act of the Commonwealth of Australia, and the Sithonia could not have left the port of Fremantle with her cargo of bulk grain without the official certificate that these regulations had been complied with. The appellant's counsel contended that compliance with the regulations was the full extent of the shipowner's duty. This is plainly not the case. The regulations are for the purpose of securing that ship and cargo can safely face the dangers of the voyage, but the shipowners have undertaken, not only to carry the cargo to its destination, but to unload it there, and must have contemplated that stevedores would be employed for this purpose. As between the shipowner and the pursuer, the former must be regarded as the occupier and the latter as an invitee who comes to work in the hold in consequence of the contract made between the shipowner and the pursuer's employers. The shipowner's responsibility for the safety of the structure is not indeed absolute, but, on the principle of Indermaur v. Dames,[1] he owes to the invitee a duty of adequate care. If adequate care was not exercised in fitting and securing the shore, it would be no answer (as the appellant's counsel candidly admitted) to say that the shipowner employed an independent contractor at Fremantle to do the work. For this last proposition reference may usefully be made to a recent decision of the Court of Appeal in Wilkinson v. Rea Ltd.,[2] and especially to the observations of Luxmoore J.[3] I can see no ground for drawing a distinction between the permanent structure of the ship and the temporary erections put up in her holds for the purpose of the special cargo she was carrying.

The first, and crucial, question, therefore, is whether the fixing and securing of the shore at Fremantle were done with adequate care. This, in turn, largely depends on whether the "chock" was fastened by nails of adequate length, or whether the evidence as to shorter nails is to be believed. It would be difficult to imagine an issue in which the decision more completely depends on the view of the trial judge as to the trustworthiness of the testimony given in his presence by the witnesses who asserted that the "chock" became detached by the accident, and that they found that it had only been fastened with short nails. The Lord Ordinary, who alone had the opportunity of judging of their veracity at first hand, has believed what they said. It is unfortunate that neither the "chock" nor the shore were preserved after the accident so that they could be produced at the trial, but I am not satisfied that their absence helps the shipowner to whom the pieces of wood belonged. Without throwing any doubt upon the sincerity of the Australian witnesses, it is fair to observe that they were testifying some 15 months after the accident and 18 months after the work was done. If small nails were improperly used to fasten the "chock," this must have escaped their attention, and once the mistake was made it may well be that inspection would not detect it. The four judges of the Second Division did not differ from the Lord Ordinary's view that short nails were employed and, in such a case as this and in view of the evidence given, the House could not, in my opinion, properly set aside this concurrent finding of fact.

As regards (b), the appellant made a series of allegations of fault against the second-named respondents and contended that the proximate cause of the accident was to be found in one or other of these alleged shortcomings. First, he contended that it was the duty of master stevedores, as soon as the unloading of the cargo had proceeded far enough to expose the shores which had been buried in the grain, to remove the shores altogether and thus obviate the possibility of their falling at a later stage upon those who were working below them. The appellant's evidence in support of this view largely related to practice in a particular line of vessels where the company does its own stevedoring, and where the removal of shores might be explained because they would otherwise impede the work of discharge, or because the holds were being cleared for a return cargo other than bulk grain. I agree with the view of the Lord Ordinary that the evidence did not establish any practice of removing shores for reasons of safety or security, and, indeed, if shores are securely and properly fixed, there would seem to be no need to remove them for such reasons. The Sithonia met with no exceptionally severe weather on her voyage, and it is a striking fact that the fall of a shore in circumstances like the present is so unusual an event that none of the witnesses called in the case could speak to it ever having happened before. This circumstance, to my mind, strongly confirms the view that there was something faulty in the fixing of this particular shore that was the cause of the accident. Next, the appellant contended that the second-named respondents were liable for failure to inspect the shores and to detect the weakness of this particular shore before it fell. Here again, I agree with the view of the Scottish courts that it was not proved to be part of the regular practice or course of duty of stevedoring firms to make such inspection; of course, if they observed that a particular shore was loose, their duty would be to take immediate precautions, but in the present case there seems no reason to think, and it certainly was not proved, that the shore which collapsed gave any appearance, before its fall, of being dangerous. The appellant further urged that an explanation of the collapse might be found in the vibration set up by the working of the two elevators used for discharging the grain, or by a portion of this apparatus getting into actual contact with the shore, or by the wires which hauled the "ploughs" in the hold fouling the shore in some way. These arguments were developed before us at considerable length, but the short answer to them is that, though it is conceivable that one or other of these matters might bring about the accident, there is not sufficient evidence that any of them did. The method of discharging grain cargoes at Princes Dock, Glasgow, is exceptional, for the more modern and customary use of suction is not employed. But the evidence does not at all justify the conclusion that the methods of unloading employed at Princes Dock are not proper, and, as I have said, no one was able to say that an accident of this sort had happened there before. The appellant went so far as to argue that, since Glasgow was not named in his contract as the port of discharge, he was not required to provide against the special circumstances of unloading at that port. The answer, of course, is that Glasgow was within the range of ports at which he might be required to discharge, and that in any event it is not proved that the methods employed at Princes Dock caused the shore to fall when it would not have fallen had the unloading taken place elsewhere.

My Lords, the decision in this case turns almost entirely on questions of fact, as to which the courts in Scotland have given the fullest attention and have reached the unanimous conclusion that the appellant, and the appellant alone, is liable for this deplorable accident. There are no adequate grounds on which that conclusion could be disturbed, and I accordingly move that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

My Lords, my noble and learned friend, Lord Romer, authorizes me to say that he has read the opinion which I have just delivered, and concurs in it.

seeks to recover damages for injuries sustained by him on April 29, 1938, while employed as a stevedore's labourer by the second respondents in the discharge of bulk grain from No. 2 hold of the S.S. Sithonia, which belonged to the appellant and was then lying alongside in Princes Dock, Glasgow. The first respondent originally raised the action against the appellant, but, in view of the defence stated by the appellant, he convened the second respondents as defenders, and now sues the appellant and the second respondents jointly and severally or severally for the damages claimed. After proof led before him, the Lord Ordinary (Lord Robertson) decerned against the present appellant for payment to the pursuer of £1,350 in the name of damages, and assoilzied the present second respondents. On a reclaiming motion by the appellant, who did not challenge the quantum of damages awarded, the decision of the Lord Ordinary was affirmed by the Second Division of the Court of Session. The present appeal is taken against these decisions.

As in the Inner House, the appellant maintained in this House that he was entitled to absolvitor, and, alternatively, that the first respondent's injuries were jointly caused by his (the appellant's) fault and that of the second respondents, who were thus jointly liable with him. Again, no question was raised as to the quantum of damages, if liability was established.

There is no doubt that the serious injuries sustained by the first respondent were caused by a heavy timber shore which fell on his head while he was operating a grain plough, which gathered the grain so as to feed the elevator, which raised it to the main deck. The Lord Ordinary has fully described the position and purpose of the shore in relation to the shifting-boards, and the construction of the shifting-boards, as also the way in which the discharge of the grain was being conducted by the second respondents, who were employed by the appellant for that purpose. The shifting-boards are a necessary precaution in the case of cargoes of grain in bulk, so as to obviate the risk of the grain shifting during the voyage in heavy weather; the province of the shores is to maintain the shifting-boards in position. While the shifting-boards serve no purpose after the cargo has reached its destination, it is not really practicable to remove the shores until at least a substantial portion of the grain in the particular hold has been removed.

The Lord Ordinary held it proved that the amidships end of the shore in question had not been properly secured at Fremantle, in respect that the wooden chock, which was designed to prevent the shore from springing upwards, had been nailed to the shifting-board by nails of an inadequate length, and that this was the cause of the accident; he held that the appellant was therein negligent, and that such negligence was a breach of the duty owed by the appellant to the first respondent. This view was affirmed by the Inner House. As regards the crucial finding of fact as to the failure of the appellant to have the shore properly secured at Fremantle, I may express my concurrence in the view of my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack in the speech which he has just delivered, which I have had the opportunity of considering, and I agree that this finding must stand. There remains the question whether such failure of the appellant constituted a breach of any duty owed by him to the first respondent, and, if so, whether it can be causally connected with the accident.

My Lords, I have no doubt that the shifting-boards, including the shores, were part of the fittings of the ship, and, contrary to the views of Lord Mackay, I am of opinion that the cases of Simpson v. Burrell & Son & Paton[4] and M'Lachlan v. Steamship "Peveril" Co. Ltd.[5] are directly relevant, and that, unless the appellant can show special circumstances which would impose the duty of inspection on the stevedore, he is liable for the results of the unsafe condition of the shore to the first respondent, to whom he owed a duty to take reasonable care under the well-known principle of Indermaur v. Dames.[6] While the certificate of the Australian surveyors, given under the statutory regulations of Australia, may be of some evidential value, in a case such as the present one, as to the steps taken by the appellant to secure the proper construction of the shifting-board, it cannot absolve the appellant of his duty to the first respondent; further, the ship undertook not only the carriage of the grain during the voyage, but also the discharge of the grain at any port at which it undertook to discharge by the contract of carriage or by subsequent agreement. Counsel for the appellant submitted that this would place an unreasonable burden on the ship, as the ultimate port of discharge might not be in view at the time of the construction of the shifting-boards, but the answer is simple, viz., either secure adequately the shifting-boards, or take steps to remove them or make sure of their adequacy by inspection at the port of discharge by the ship itself or by arrangement with the stevedores. Of course, it might be that the practice of a particular port was so inveterate that the ship was entitled to rely, as part of their arrangement for employment of the stevedore, on the discharge of such duty of inspection by the latter, and it may be that the employees of the stevedore would be affected by such transfer of the duty of inspection, but that question does not arise for consideration in this appeal, for I am clearly of opinion that the evidence in this case falls far short of proving any such inveterate practice. If it proves anything it proves a variety of practice, and is inconsistent with the appellant's case. The same is true of the alleged practice of removal of the shores by the stevedore.

The appellant maintained that the second respondents were negligent in three respects, viz., (1) in putting in an apparatus which might foul the shore in course of the operations, (2) in the amount of vibration caused during the operation, and (3) in the operation of the ploughs, any of which caused, or might tend to cause the loosening of the shore. But, in my opinion, these contentions are excluded by the admission of the appellant's counsel, made in answer to a question by one of your Lordships, that nothing that was done in the present case was unusual, and that this is the first time that a shore has fallen as this one did. It is not suggested that, in the present case, the second respondents, or any of their employees, observed, or should have observed, prior to the falling of the shore, anything which would have warned them that the shore was loose or dangerous. The appellant's case against the second respondents fails, and it follows, in my opinion, that the courts below were well justified in holding that the appellant's negligence in construction of the shifting-boards was the cause of the accident and was in breach of the duty owed by him to the first respondent, and that he alone is liable to the first respondent. I therefore agree with the motion proposed by my noble and learned friend.

LORD WRIGHT. My Lords, I have had the advantage of considering in print the speech which my noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor has just delivered. I agree with it and merely add a few supplementary observations on some general matters of principle which seem to me to be involved.

That the first respondent was working on the appellant's premises, the steamship Sithonia, as an invitee and not as a mere licensee has not been questioned. Thus the case fell within the general rule enunciated in Indermaur v. Dames.[7] The rule there laid down as to the duty of the invitor to the invitee has been affirmed in several decisions of this House, whether the particular case was held to fall within or without the rule. In the present appeal, however, the failure to exercise due care for the safety of the invitee which has been found, was due not to the negligence of the appellant or his servants but to that of independent contractors, the Australian shipwrights who constructed the shifting-boards before the grain was loaded. I agree with the Lord Chancellor in his approval of the decision of the Court of Appeal in Wilkinson v. Rea Ltd.,[8] where it was held by Luxmoore L.J., with whom MacKinnon L.J. concurred, that the invitor was not excused for a failure to perform his duty to the invitee merely because he had entrusted performance to another. Luxmoore L.J. adopted the view of Williams J. in Pickard v. Smith.[9] The duty of the invitor towards the invitee is, in my opinion, a duty personal to the former, in the sense that he does not get rid of the obligation by entrusting its performance to independent contractors. It is true that the invitor is not an insurer: he warrants, however, that due care and skill to make the premises reasonably safe for the invitee have been exercised, whether by himself, his servants, or agents or by independent contractors whom he employs to perform his duty. He does not fulfil the warranty merely by leaving the work to contractors however reputable or generally competent. His warranty is broken if they fail to exercise the proper care and skill. This is only an instance of the general rule which was stated by Lord Blackburn in another connexion in Dalton v. Henry Angus & Co.,[10] where he distinguished the case of what has been called the collateral negligence of a sub-contractor from their negligence in failing to perform a duty resting on the principal himself who "cannot escape from the responsibility attaching to him of seeing "that duty performed by delegating it to a contractor." Lord Blackburn again enunciated the same principle in Hughes v. Percival.[11] More recently this House, again in a different context of fact, applied this rule in Wilsons and Clyde Coal Co. Ltd. v. English.[12] It is always a question of the extent of the duty incurred. In the present case the invitee is not concerned with the course which the invitor adopts by way of discharging the duty. He is entitled when he comes on the invitor's premises to rely on the warranty that the invitor's duty to him has been performed and to complain if he is injured because the duty has not been properly performed.

THOMSON v. CREMIN.

Mr. Duffes, when this question was raised in the argument before this House, said that he did not rely on the fact that the neglect was that of the sub-contractor, first, because the point was not pleaded, and secondly, because he was not optimistic of success in arguing it. I feel that the fairness and candour of Mr. Duffes deserve a recognition on my part that he was justified in his want of optimism. On the facts found and admitted the question raised by the employment of the independent contractors hits one in the face; speaking for myself, I should be unwilling to decide against the appellant if I did not think, as I do, that the employment by the appellant of the Australian shipwrights, though a competent firm of good repute, afforded him no defence in this action.

Nor do I think that the appellant can in this action rely on the Commonwealth Government certificate that the regulations as to shifting-boards had been complied with, or claim that it constitutes sufficient evidence that he had fulfilled his duty to the first respondent.

These regulations are for the purpose of satisfying the requirements of the public policy of the Commonwealth, and do not in general affect private and personal duties and rights, whether contractual or such as those arising in this case from the relationship between the appellant and the first respondent.

With the greatest respect to Lord Mackay, I cannot see any reason to hold the second respondents responsible to the first respondent either solely or conjunctly with the appellant. To hold a master stevedore in the absence of special circumstances of suspicion subject to a general duty towards his men to inspect the structure of the vessel, whether permanent or temporary, whether shifting-boards, stanchions or the like, would, I think, be contrary to practice and inconsistent with the exigencies of the case. He comes on board the vessel, the shipowner's premises, to carry out the loading or discharging and, unless there are special stipulations in the contract, is prima facie entitled to assume that the shipowner has discharged his duty of care in regard to the safety of the premises. He is on board the ship for a special and limited purpose and has in the ordinary course no right to interfere with the structure, temporary or permanent, of the vessel. No doubt if there are apparent indications which he observes, or ought to observe, that the structure is defective, he owes a duty to take reasonable measures for the protection of his men. But there was nothing of the sort in the present case. I agree generally with what was said on this question by the Lord Justice-Clerk in M'Lachlan v. Peveril S.S. Co. Ltd.,[13] though if there was something manifestly wrong and dangerous, I think that the stevedore should refuse to go on with the work until the defect was remedied. I cannot, however, see what purpose would be served by a slight inspection of the structure by the master stevedore where there was no special ground of suspicion, while to require it would place an unwarranted and unbusinesslike burden on the stevedores.

I do not find in this case any occasion for invoking the formula generally described as res ipsa loquitur. That is little more than a prima facie presumption of evidence of very limited use; where it exists, it can always be rebutted. It does not arise at all in the present case. Though the structure was throughout in the possession and control of the shipowner, it was exposed to many external influences not involving negligence of the appellant from the date when it was erected until the time when the shore fell, such as perils of the seas, and possible damage in the course of the unloading operations; in addition, the risk of a latent defect cannot be ignored. Hence the occurrence of the accident is not in itself any evidence, even prima facie, of breach of duty by the appellant. Some evidence pointing to a specific fault is in my opinion here necessary to satisfy the onus which rests on the respondent to establish negligence. It is on the specific evidence of defective workmanship that the decision is to be justified in this case.

The various observations which I have made are merely supplementary to the reasoning of the Lord Chancellor, with which, as I have already stated, I agree.

I concur in the motion proposed.

LORD PORTER. My Lords, the question to be considered in the present case is, I think, one of fact rather than of law, and ultimately turns upon whether the view of the Lord Ordinary and his method of solving the problem can be supported. The first respondent, Joseph Cremin, was injured by the fall of a shore in No. 2 hold of the S.S. Sithonia when he was engaged in discharging her at Princes Dock, [13] 23 R. (Ct. of Sess.) 753.

THOMSON v. CREMIN.
Lord Porter.

Glasgow. He was a docker in the service of the second respondents, Andrew Main & Sons, who were the stevedores employed by the appellant to effect that discharge.

The shore was erected to support certain shifting-boards placed below the hatch in accordance with the provisions of statutory rules made under the Navigation Act, 1912–1926, of the Commonwealth of Australia. By Part III, r. 9 of those rules it was provided: "(1) Where bulk grain is loaded in any ship shifting-boards shall be "erected in the ship to the satisfaction of the surveyor. . . . "(2) Shifting-boards where fitted . . . (b) shall be properly secured "to the satisfaction of the surveyor . . . between uprights and shored "or stayed in position."

In the Sithonia the shifting-boards in way of the hatchway did not extend to the bottom of the hold; they were supported by stilts and by vertical wooden uprights nailed on each side of the shifting-boards. They received lateral support from the shores, which were made fast at the skin of the ship and ran thence at an upward angle of 10 to 15 degrees to the shifting-boards in the centre of the hold where they were kept in position by being driven down on the vertical wooden uprights and fastened with nails; a wooden chock was then fastened above the inboard end of the shore, also with nails, in order to prevent upward thrust.

It was found by the Lord Ordinary that had nails of an adequate size been used this was a proper and usual method of securing the shore, its lateral movement being prevented by the nails fastening it to the uprights whilst the upward thrust, which was the chief force exercised upon it, was checked by the chock nailed above. The nails, however, in each case should have been 5 inches long by 5-inch gauge, and the Lord Ordinary has found that whereas those used to prevent lateral movement were of the right kind, those used to secure the chock were only $2\frac{1}{2}$ or at most 3 inches in length, with the result that the chock and shore came away and fell, injuring the first respondent.

This finding was strongly controverted by the appellant on the grounds that: (1) It was not relied upon in the condescendence. (2) It was not put, or any rate not adequately put, to the witnesses in Australia who were responsible for the erection. (3) It was against the weight of evidence.

As to (1) and (2), the allegation in the condescendence is that the shore rested on a light piece of wood about 1 inch thick secured to the shifting-board by means of small nails, and by cross-interrogatories the Australian witnesses were asked whether such a construction was a proper one.

It is true that the suggested defence might have been put more clearly and definitely. The statement as made contains, I think, three separate grounds of complaint not differentiated one from the other, viz.: (1) that the chock was too narrow, (2) that it was placed below the shore instead of above it, and (3) that both chock and shore were secured by small nails. But I think the condescendence does give sufficient warning that one ground upon which reliance was placed was that improper nails were used in the chock as well as the shore.

In the case of the cross-interrogatories the same case was put to the Australian witnesses and the same warning given.

The method of obtaining evidence from abroad by means of interrogatories and cross-interrogatories has the advantage of cheapness and often saves time. No doubt it is fully justified for these reasons, but in a case where the facts are seriously in dispute and a careful inquiry into the observation and recollection of witnesses is called for it necessarily fails to achieve the best results. Even a direct inquiry whether short nails were not used would be an inadequate test since it would not probe the grounds upon which the witness based his answer. The court, which has to decide the question, must in such circumstances do the best it can on the material before it, acting upon the general impression created by the answers to the interrogatories in conjunction with the viva voce evidence given in Scotland.

As to (3), the Lord Ordinary was able to form a view of the witnesses he saw and of their evidence, and, if he thought it more reliable than that from Australia, to accept it as against the other. Indeed, speaking for myself, I should say that there is a good reason for thinking that the Australian witnesses were not recollecting exactly what was done on the particular ship, but speaking to a general practice. I recognize that Mr. Heron, who was in charge of the work on behalf of the contractors, does say that 5-inch nails of 5-inch gauge were used in this ship in fastening both the shore and the chock, but, as his evidence had to be obtained by means of interrogatories, he could not be subjected to close cross-examination and the Scottish witnesses may well have been more accurate.

If, then, 5-inch nails were required to make the structure secure and were usually inserted, and if only 3-inch nails were used, the shipowner, subject to certain considerations with which I deal below, would be guilty of negligence and would be liable to the injured man.

The first consideration urged against his liability was that the only duty which the shipowner owed in respect of the shifting-boards and any shores erected to secure them was that the requirements of the surveyor in Australia should be complied with. Admittedly this had been done and the appropriate certificate secured.

Primarily, shifting-boards are erected for the safety of the ship to prevent the grain shifting and to make her seaworthy for the voyage she is undertaking. Even for that purpose the certificate of the surveyor would, I think, only be effective provided the obligation was merely to take due care to make the ship seaworthy, not if the obligation were absolute to make her so. To comply with the regulations is to fulfil an obligation towards the Commonwealth and to avoid the guilt of breaking a statutory obligation. Its fulfilment would protect the shipowner from criminal liability for such a breach, but would not insure him against all claims for negligence by a third party. I cannot accept the argument as having any bearing on the liability of the ship to a docker working in her holds. Towards him the duty is at least to refrain from negligently erecting anything likely to do him injury, or, to put it more broadly, as a minimum to take due care to make the structures in the hold secure against causing injury to anyone required to work in the hold for the ship's purposes. But, said the shipowner, this shore was not likely to injure the man because it should have been removed by the master stevedore before the docker worked under the place where it was, and even if its removal was not obligatory it should have been carefully inspected on behalf of the stevedore as soon as the discharge of the grain which surrounded its fastenings made this course possible.

Accordingly the stevedore, it was contended, was either solely responsible for the accident or, at any rate, his negligence contributed to its incidence and if so, by Scottish law, each of the defenders, the ship and the stevedore, would be under a conjunct and several liability to the injured man under which he could recover the whole sum awarded from either or both, but each would be liable to indemnify the other if that other should pay more than half.

In my opinion this argument fails on the evidence given and facts as found. No general practice of removing shores was proved except in a case where they interfered with the work being done in the hold. Indeed, the general effect of the evidence was to the contrary.

It is true that some of the witnesses from amongst the dockers and their representatives speak to the practice of removing shores, as does

v.
CREMIN.
Lord Porter.

one of the ship's officers, but the former base themselves largely upon the practice of the Donaldson Atlantic Line, who do their own stevedoring and therefore are authorized by the ship itself to remove the shores from their own ship without requiring special permission, and the latter has a very slight acquaintance with the carriage of grain in bulk. Moreover, the stevedores employed on the Donaldson Atlantic Line themselves stated the object of removing the shores to be, not the safety of the men engaged, but the due performance of the work, which would be impeded by leaving the shores in position. In the case of their Line bulk grain is generally carried in the bottom of the hold only. Where this occurs the shifting-boards must extend to the bottom of the hold and if not removed would interfere with the discharge of the grain. They are not erected, as in the case of the Sithonia, at the top of the hold only, where they do not get in the way of men working below. Nor can I put much reliance upon the allegation of dockers who say, after an accident has occurred, that the removal is for their safety. The administrative staff, not the workers, know the object of the removal, and it is illuminating to remember that the occurrence of such an accident was unprecedented, and even after it had occurred the men discharging the Sithonia continued to work below the long shores without demur, though some shorter shores across the mouth of the hatch, which have no bearing upon the matters discussed before your Lordships but appear to have been loose, were first made secure on the orders of the only ship's officer left on board.

But the appellant argues that there was another circumstance to which the loosening of the shore should be attributed. It is common ground that two elevators were used in discharging the hold, and it was said that to use two and not one would result in greatly increased vibration and would naturally shake the shore from its fastenings.

Some vibration no doubt there was, and it may well have had some effect on loosening a shore which was insufficiently secured, but it was not proved to be unusual to use two elevators and the Lord Ordinary did not accept the contention that any undue vibration had occurred.

A further argument, however, was put forward on behalf of the ship. It was said that the normal method of discharge of a bulk grain cargo is by suction, that that method does not require the presence of dockers in the hold, and that the shipowner was not obliged to make himself acquainted with unusual means of discharging which are confined to an individual port. It was further said that the ship was sent to discharge part of her cargo at Southampton and that it was not until that port was reached that she received orders to proceed to Glasgow for final discharge. Therefore her owners, when erecting the shifting-boards, did not know that the method of discharge adopted at Princes Dock, Glasgow, would be used or that the dockers would be exposed to the risk of a falling shore.

The simplest answer to this argument is, I think, that a shipowner chartering a ship or carrying a cargo to a range of ports, even though the choice of the individual port be postponed until a later date, knows, when loading, to what ports or range of ports he may be ordered and must make himself familiar with the normal incidents of discharge at those ports.

To fulfil his contract he requires stevedores to put out the cargo, and he must safeguard them against risks of which he knows or ought to know and they do not. In the present case such an obligation casts no great burden upon him when it is remembered how important a grain port Glasgow is, and that even Princes Dock received a considerable number of cargoes of bulk grain.

If, then, the ship be responsible at least for taking all reasonable precautions that the structures in her hold, whether permanent or temporary, be erected with care sufficient to ensure that no danger shall exist which is likely to cause injury to men employed to work in her holds, she is liable in the present instance unless some intervening negligence of another, in this case of the stevedores, is also a cause of the accident, and is solely liable unless that negligence contributed to the accident.

In the present case I agree with the Lord Ordinary and the Inner House in thinking that no negligence has been shown on the part of the stevedores.

If the shore had been obviously loose and if any casual observation would have shown this state of affairs, the stevedore might have had to share the blame. But no general practice of examination was proved to exist, no severity of weather in the course of the voyage gave rise to any suspicion of damage and no such accident had been known to occur before.

In M'Lachlan v. Steamship "Peveril" Co. Ltd.[14] the pursuer was injured by the fall of a stanchion which was said to be insufficiently fastened so that the slight touch of a sling in the course of the discharge caused it to fall and injure him. He sued both ship and stevedores and against the latter his allegation was that their foreman knew or ought to have known that the stanchion was practically unfastened and unsupported. Yet the Inner House held that no relevant plea had been averred against the stevedores. The Lord Justice-Clerk, with whom Lords Trayner and Moncrieff agreed, in the course of his judgment[15] assented to the proposition "that a stevedore is "not called upon to look to the security of the fastenings on board a "ship on which he has to work." He added: "Of course a stevedore "who happened to notice anything which was seriously wrong should "point it out, but he could not have any power in the management of "the ship; and if the people on board the ship—the master or "owner—to whom he made a complaint were to say to him, 'Attend "'to your own business, we will attend to ours; we are quite satisfied "'with it,' I do not think he could have refused to carry on his "work to the best of his ability." Even Lord Young, who dissented, said[16]: "I think there is authority to the effect that a very slight "supervision will be sufficient on the part of the stevedore to exempt "him from responsibility, and that he may assume that this, that, "and the other thing are all right in a ship without making a special "examination."

In dealing with the present case it is not necessary to go so far as the Lord Justice-Clerk. If Lord Young is right, and I think that he is, the stevedores are not liable. There is nothing to suggest that the shore was so obviously loose that it must have been seen by anyone making a casual inspection and no circumstances which would fasten an accusation of negligence upon those to whom the discharge was entrusted.

It was urged, however, that the Lord Ordinary had approached the subject in the wrong way—he had relied upon the argument that the shore had fallen, that shores do not normally fall without some negligence on the part of those who set them up and that the shipowner was in control of the ship's hold from the time of the erection until the finish of the discharge. He accordingly applied the doctrine which is commonly referred to as res ipsa loquitur. Even if the first two assumptions were conceded, it was contended that the third was not justified since the stevedore and not the ship was in charge of the unloading.

I doubt if this criticism is justified. It is true, I think, to say that the doctrine cannot strictly apply inasmuch as the shore might have been displaced by the activities of the stevedore or his men. Had there been no evidence except that the shore fell, the argument that the shipowner had not been proved to be in fault would have had considerable weight. But the method of discharging, the events which happened during its incidence, and the possibility of negligence on the part of the stevedore and of danger from vibration were all thoroughly canvassed. The Lord Ordinary, after hearing this evidence, came to the conclusion that no act of the stevedore or his men caused or contributed to the accident and there was ample evidence to support his finding.

If all causes except improper fastening in Australia be eliminated the blame may rightly be attributed to those responsible for failure to make the shore fast there, and in a somewhat loose sense it may be said that the mere fall of something which should not have fallen shows negligence in those who erected it.

I agree that the shipowner was solely to blame and would dismiss the appeal.

Legal Aid — Costs — Divorce — Divorce Department — Wife's case conducted through Divorce Department—Recommendation for increased fee to wife's counsel—Allocation of cases to Divorce Department—Notional ability of husband to provide security for costs—Interpretation of regulation—Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949 (12 & 13 Geo. 6, c. 51), s. 6 (7)—Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950 (S.I. 1950, No. 1359), regs. 5 (10), 18 (5) and Schedule.
Barrister—Fees.

On the hearing of an issue as to domicile, the husband unsuccessfully contended that he was domiciled in England when his petition for divorce was presented. Both parties were assisted persons; the husband's disposable income had been assessed at £362, the wife's at nil. The conduct of the wife's case was given to a solicitor employed by the Law Society Divorce Department under section 6 (7) of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, and regulation 5 (10) of the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950 (as amended in 1954). No order had been made at the hearing of an application (after the grant of her legal aid certificate) for security for her costs. Approval had been given by the appropriate area committee for the husband to be represented by leading counsel. The disbursements on behalf of the wife were estimated at some £40:—

Held, (1) That the case was one in which it was proper in the circumstances for a recommendation to be made under regulation 18 (5) of the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950 (as amended in 1954), that counsel for the wife should receive a higher fee than the amount set out in the schedule. The case had been adjudged by the area committee to be one of difficulty which should properly be met by the briefing of two counsel for the husband; and it was of equal difficulty in respect of the wife's case.

(2) That while the Divorce Department are entitled, as against the litigant, to ask for costs to be taxed and paid on the footing that they act as a normal solicitor entitled to full profit costs, the proper order in all the circumstances of the present case would be that the husband pay £60 by instalments of £3 a month.

Per curiam: The test for sending a case to the Divorce Department is not "has an order for security been made" nor "has it "been refused." The test is "if an order were made might the "husband reasonably be expected to find" a sum of £10 or such lesser sum as may be applicable; and this simply turns on estimating his financial resources. The proviso to regulation 5 (10) was worded so as to avoid uneconomic applications being made for small amounts of security. The allocation of the present case to the Divorce Department appeared to have been made on the wrong basis.

APPLICATION for costs.

The parties were both Italian subjects, were Roman Catholics, and were married in Italy in 1948. There were two children of the marriage. In 1952 the husband came to England, leaving the wife and children in Italy. One of the express purposes for which he came to this country was to seek a divorce, which was not available to him in Italy. On July 13, 1953, he presented a petition for divorce on the ground of cruelty. The wife entered an appearance under protest, alleging that the husband was not domiciled in England when the petition was filed; and it was directed on September 6, 1954, that there should be a separate trial of the issue as to domicile. The court found in favour of the wife upon the issue.

Both parties were assisted persons, the husband having been granted a certificate before the presentation of his petition and the wife who had previously been represented by a private firm of solicitors, in June, 1954. The husband's disposable income was assessed at £362 a year; the wife's contribution was assessed as nil. The conduct of the wife's case was given to a solicitor employed by the Law Society in the Law Society, Divorce Department, who applied on her behalf for security for her costs; no order was made on the application. Leave was given by the appropriate area committee on an application under regulation 14 (3) (d) of the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, for the husband to be represented by leading counsel.

It appeared that at the time of the hearing the husband was in receipt of a salary of £670 a year in a temporary post, that he was making through his mother an allowance of £16 10s. a month to his wife and children, and that his salary was likely to be reduced to £425, from which £125 would be deducted for maintenance, as his new post would be an internal one.

Application was made at the conclusion of the issue for the wife's costs. It was stated that the actual disbursements on her behalf had amounted to some £40.

BEZZI v. BEZZI.

James Stirling Q.C. and John Mortimer for the husband.

A. B. Hollis for the wife applied for costs taxed on the footing that it was an ordinary case.

Stirling Q.C. Should not the costs be assessed as incurred by the Divorce Department?

SACHS J. The result of the Act and the regulations as they stand is that, although the Divorce Department conducts work on a footing which is regarded as "cut price," and does it on that basis extremely well, they are entitled as against the litigant to ask for costs to be taxed and paid on the footing that they act as a normal solicitor entitled to full profit costs. Whether that is a happy position or not is somewhat debatable. The order for profit costs is normally in excess of the expenditure which the Law Society actually incurs (by which I mean out-of-pocket expenses coupled with a rateable proportion of the salaries and office costs) and the profit goes towards the other expenses of the Divorce Department.

A matter of a different type to which I must give consideration is that the area committee having given leave for the husband to have two counsel, this may be one of those exceptional cases where I ought to make a recommendation under regulation 18 (5) of the Legal Aid (General) Regulations.[1] It seems a bit odd that the Law Society should be able to make a profit on their own costs, and at the same time that counsel should be in the position of having to conduct the case at a fraction of the normal fee.

Hollis. That is a matter for your Lordship.

SACHS J. Can you assist me on this further matter, Mr. Hollis: How did it come about that this is a Divorce Department case in view of the proviso to General Regulation 5 (10)?

Hollis. In fact, there was an application for security for costs although I do not know how far it was pressed; but certainly no order was ever made.

[1] Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950 (as amended by Legal Aid (General) (Amendment No. 1) Regulations, 1954 (S.I. 1954/166)): Reg. 18 (5): "Until the Lord Chancellor otherwise prescribes, the determination of the sums allowed to counsel retained by solicitors employed by The Law Society for salaries to act in connection with matrimonial causes concluded after the date upon which this regulation comes into force [March 1, 1954] shall, having regard to the lack of means of assisted persons of that class (being persons from whom, had there not been legal aid, solicitors and barristers would have customarily accepted specially low remuneration), unless the Lord Chancellor in any particular case otherwise orders, be the amounts set out in the schedule to these regulations."

Schedule: ". . . On a brief in a defended cause: £5 10s. If the total time occupied by a trial shall exceed five hours, in respect of the excess, for every complete period of five hours (if any) and for any less period not included in any such complete period: £3 5s. 6d.. . ."

[The corresponding fees for leading counsel are £8 18s. and £5 10s., and for junior counsel where two counsel are allowed, £5 10s. and £3 5s. 6d.]

SACHS J. The test for sending a case to the Divorce Department is not "has an order for security been made," nor "has it been refused." The test is "if an order were made might the husband reasonably be expected to find" a sum of £10 or such lesser sum as may be applicable; and this simply turns on estimating his financial resources. The proviso to regulation 5 (10) [2] was worded so as to avoid uneconomic applications being made for small amounts of security. The question of the case going to the Divorce Department seems to have been dealt with on the wrong basis.

[Counsel referred to the fact that the application for security was dismissed after the legal aid certificate had been granted.]

Hollis. But it is, of course, extremely rare for an order for security to be made where the husband is an assisted person.

SACHS J. That is exactly why the regulation was framed as it was. A wrong basis appears to have been applied here by a committee as regards the case being one which fell within the proviso.

Stirling Q.C. submitted on the question of costs that the husband had behaved very properly in regard to his financial obligations to his wife and children, and could not be put forward as a dishonest man because he had sworn to an English domicile.

[2] Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, reg. 5 (10): "Where an application relates to a matrimonial cause and the maximum contribution payable by the applicant is not more than £10, the local committee shall inform the applicant that if he accepts the terms upon which they are prepared to issue a certificate they will arrange for the case to be conducted, in accordance with section 6 (7) of the Act,* by a solicitor employed by The Law Society for a salary in connection with matrimonial causes: Provided that this paragraph shall not apply where the applicant is a wife and it appears to the local committee that the husband might reasonably be expected, if ordered to do so, to provide such security for her costs as would, with her contribution, if any, amount to more than £10."

The proviso was amended in 1954 by the Legal Aid (General) (Amendment No. 1) Regulations, 1954, as follows: "Provided that this paragraph shall not apply—(a) to an application made under paragraph (8) of regulation 10; [which relates to emergency certificates] or, (b) where the applicant is a wife . . . etc. . . . [as before]."

s. 6 (7): "Notwithstanding anything in subsection (4) of this section, [which relates to the assisted person's right to select counsel and solicitor from the appropriate panel himself] where the maximum contribution payable to the legal aid fund by a person receiving legal aid in connection with a matrimonial cause is not more than £10, then, unless regulations otherwise provide, the solicitor to act for him shall not be a solicitor selected from the panel but a solicitor employed whole-time for a salary to deal with cases to which this subsection applies; and where the solicitor who acts for a person receiving legal aid is one employed as aforesaid—(a) he shall not be entitled to any further payment under subsection (5) of this section [which relates to payments to solicitor and counsel out of the legal aid fund] except for his disbursements; and (b) no sum paid or payable to him otherwise than under the said subsection (5) shall be treated for the purposes of subsection (7) of section 3 of this Act [which relates to the net liability of the legal aid fund] as paid or payable on account of the person for whom he acts."

BEZZI v. BEZZI.

SACHS J. As regards the conduct of the parties you have the fact that the area committee not only considered it a fit case to proceed with, they considered it a fit case for two counsel. There is obviously no question of misconduct within the meaning of section 2 (2) (e) of the Act; but save for that protection given to him by that subsection of the Act he would be liable to pay costs in full—and the only question before me is as to what amount is " reasonable " for him to pay.

Stirling Q.C. submitted that in view of the husband's means and his conduct, including the monthly payments he was making to his wife and children, only a modest order for costs should be made.

SACHS J. This is not an easy matter on which to come to the correct conclusion. The application made before me is for costs to be taxed, which would result, of course, in the costs being taxed on the normal scale applicable to a case where a solicitor was acting in the normal way. That would result, as Mr. Hollis has agreed, in a very considerable profit to the Divorce Department of the Law Society, which would be applied to other cases in that department. On the other hand, the husband has come to England—and I have come to the conclusion that one, at any rate, of his express purposes in coming here was to get a divorce: further, having in fact taken that protection for himself which the law entitles him to take under the Legal Aid Act, he assumes also the risks inherent in litigation within the framework of that Act.

I propose to make an order against him for such costs as I consider will be reasonable in all the circumstances, including his likely future means. I think that that order should be for £60, payable by instalments of £3 a month, the first instalment to be paid one month after the final instalment due to the Law Society upon his own certificate.

There is one other thing I would mention, and that is, that the issue of domicile has been rightly adjudged by the area committee to be one of a difficulty which could be properly met by the briefing of two counsel. It seems to follow—and I am certainly going to act on that footing—that on the facts of the present case it is of equal difficulty from the point of view of those representing the wife. This is, to my mind, a case for a recommendation under General Regulation 18 (5) as being one in which counsel should receive a higher fee than that provided by the schedule to those regulations. Otherwise counsel would, of course, be paid at what I on a previous occasion have called a relatively token figure—and that would be so even where the Law Society is entitled, should they obtain a full order for costs, to make a profit out of the case.

Evershed M.R., Birkett and Romer L.JJ.

Landlord and Tenant—Forfeiture of lease—Repudiation of landlord's title — Adverse title set up — Yearly tenancy — Oral disclaimer — Sale by tenant of "all . . . the interest of the vendor"—Whether purported sale of freehold interest—Whether disclaimer by denial of landlord's title.

A yearly tenant of a cottage owned by the plaintiff council agreed to sell to the defendant "all that [his] interest" for the sum of £20. After the death of the tenant the council discovered that the defendant was occupying the cottage. They brought proceedings against him to recover possession on the ground that the tenant had disclaimed his interest by denying his landlords' title and that, therefore, the defendant was merely a trespasser. The basis for that allegation was information given by the solicitor who had acted for both parties on the occasion of the sale. He stated that the tenant had then alleged that he had owned the cottage for many years and had never paid rent for it. Accordingly, the council said that, notwithstanding the equivocal nature of the agreement, it had been intended to let the defendant into possession of the cottage with the intention of enabling him to set up a title adverse to the landlords.

Held, that if a tenant deliberately asserts a title in himself adverse to his landlord, or lets a stranger into possession with the intention of enabling him to set up such an adverse title, semble, even though (in the case of a yearly tenancy) the assertion of title against the landlord is oral, that amounts to a repudiation of the landlord's title; but that this was a question of fact; and that the council was unable to establish that such principle applied on the facts of the present case.

Principle in Doe d. Ellerbrock v. Flynn (1834) 1 C.M. & R. 137, as qualified in Doe d. Graves, Downe v. Wells (1839) 10 Adol. & E. 427, approved.

APPEAL from Deputy Judge Garth Moore sitting at Wisbech County Court.

The Wisbech St. Mary Council were the freeholders of a cottage, known as "Folleys Drove" Guyhirne, Wisbech St. Mary, Cambridgeshire, which was erected on land awarded before 1855 by an enclosure award to the predecessors in title of the council. In 1914, the property being then vested in the council, they let it to Charles James Donger (hereinafter called the tenant) at a rent of 10s. per annum. From 1914 until 1952 the tenant lived in the cottage and paid the rent, the council paying all rates and water rate. In 1952 the tenant was admitted to hospital, but he continued to pay the rent until October, 1953. Thereafter no rent was paid by anyone. In 1953, the council desired to obtain possession of the cottage in order to demolish it, and, on December 5, 1953, they wrote to the tenant who was still in hospital and asked if he would give up possession and return the key. The tenant did not reply. The council subsequently became aware that the defendant, William Lilley, was occupying the cottage at weekends, and on February 26, 1955, they wrote and asked him for the key. No reply was received to this letter. On March 19, 1955, the tenant died, and after his death it was discovered that in 1952 and shortly before being admitted to hospital he had purported to transfer his interest in the cottage to the defendant. On March 22, 1955, the council again wrote to the defendant and again received no reply. On April 7, 1955, the solicitors acting for the council wrote to a firm of solicitors stating that they understood that in 1952 the tenant had purported to convey the cottage to the defendant and that that firm had acted in respect of the transaction. A member of the firm, a Mr. Farrow, replied on April 19, 1955, stating that the tenant had come to them in July, 1952, and said that he had agreed to sell his cottage to the defendant, but that as he had been unable to produce any deeds they had only been able to draw up an agreement between the parties whereby the tenant had agreed to sell all his interest in the cottage to the defendant. The letter continued: "We think we should point out that Donger "told us that he had owned the place for some 40 years and had "never paid rent and we think that at any rate no rent has been "paid for the last three years, for Donger was practically "penniless." The council brought proceedings against the defendant in the county court to recover possession. At the hearing on September 27, 1955, the defendant did not appear. The agreement of August 2, 1952, was put in evidence and, so far as material, read as follows: "The vendor shall sell and the "purchaser shall purchase all that the interest of the vendor in "the cottage . . . for the sum of £20 . . ." There followed a provision that the purchaser was to allow the vendor to come and live in the cottage when and if he wanted to. Mr. Farrow gave evidence, according to the judge's note, as follows: "July, 1952, "Donger told me he had agreed to sell cottage to Lilley. I "acted then for both. I prepared the agreement of August 2, "1952, there being no deeds. About September 14, 1955, "defendant came to my office about ten minutes before registrar "sat [a reference to the proceedings taken by the council "against him]. I said I could not act for him after that time "as he had not given me a fair chance. In writing the letter "of April 19, 1955, I was acting for the defendant. The facts in "the letter are true."

It was submitted on behalf of the council that the agreement of August 2, 1952, was a denial of the title of the council as landlords and that, accordingly, the interest of the tenant had been determined. The county court judge dismissed the council's claim and they appealed.

Nigel Bridge for the council

The defendant did not appear and was not represented.

No cases other than those referred to in the judgment of Evershed M.R. were cited in argument.

EVERSHED M.R. In this appeal Mr. Bridge, for the council, has raised a point of interest and of an unusual character which he has put with his usual attractiveness; but I have felt unable to accept it. Mr. Bridge has contended that where a tenant (namely, a tenant from year to year) of a cottage has let a stranger into possession with the intention of enabling that stranger to set up an adverse title to the landlord, so that the landlord is thereby put in a worse position, then the tenant must be taken by his act to have disclaimed and put an end to his interest as tenant. It is said by Mr. Bridge that the circumstances of this case form an example of the proposition which I have stated.

[His Lordship stated the facts and after reading the note of Mr. Farrow's evidence which is set out above, went on:]

I have read the whole of that evidence because upon it and upon the last statement, "The facts in the letter are true," really hangs the whole of Mr. Bridge's case. The reason that he must so link his case to that statement and the letter emerges from the terms of the agreement of August 2, 1952. It is merely an agreement. [His Lordship referred to the terms of the agreement and went on:] That agreement is plainly, upon its terms, equivocal as to the title, if any, which the tenant was alleging that he had.

As Mr. Bridge therefore concedes, if the matter rested on that document alone he could not for a moment contend that it formed evidence of a letting by the tenant of a stranger into possession with the intention that an adverse title to the landlord should be set up. In order to bring himself within his proposition at all Mr. Bridge prays in aid the letter of April 19, which Mr. Farrow said was true as to the facts therein stated. [His Lordship read the letter as set out above:]

I felt some doubt as to the admissibility of some of the evidence that Mr. Farrow gave; for he was, at relevant dates, acting as solicitor for the defendant as well as for the tenant, and if professional privilege existed Mr. Farrow was in no position to waive it. But, assuming that no question of that kind arises, it is said by Mr. Bridge that the statement in Mr. Farrow's letter (if true, as one must assume it is) proved that the tenant at the date of the transaction was asserting that he was the owner —that is, the absolute owner—of this cottage, and that, contrary to the facts, he had never paid any rent in respect of it: so that such assertion, together with the sale to the defendant (according to the argument), amounted to an act aimed at enabling the defendant to set up a title adverse to the council. I was myself inclined to think during the argument that the tenant, assuming these facts are true, was really deceiving the defendant by telling him (contrary to the fact) that no rent was paid, and that he was the owner, in order that he might extract £20 from the defendant. It may be that that uncharitable view is wrong. It may be, as Romer L.J. pointed out, that this old gentleman (for he was old then and in a very ailing condition) may have regarded the slight sum of 10s. a year as of no account and he may genuinely have thought that he had paid and was paying no rent in any true sense of the term. On either view it seems to me, put at its highest, by no means clear, as an inference from these facts (assuming them all to be true), that this was a transaction aimed at enabling the defendant to set up a title adverse to the true owner. It seems to me that, whatever the tenant may have thought or may have tried to represent as to his position, he was not concerned to enable somebody, namely, the defendant, to challenge a title which he was not himself in any way concerned to dispute.

The proposition which Mr. Bridge has founded upon is illustrated by old cases in the books. We were referred to Doe d. Ellerbrock v. Flynn.[1] That was a case in which (as the jury found) the defendant Flynn was beyond any question claiming and intending to claim and to assert a proprietorship of the property adverse to the lessors of one Townsend, and the transaction between Townsend and Flynn was, as the jury found, and (as the court held) found justly, designed to enable Flynn to oust the lessors of Townsend if he could. Thus, Lord Lyndhurst C.B. said[2]: "I think that the jury, upon the "facts proved at the trial, came to a right conclusion. If the "tenant sets up a title hostile to that of his landlord, it is a "forfeiture of his term; and it is the same if he assists another "person to set up such a claim. Whether he does the act "himself, or only colludes with another to do it, it is equally a "forfeiture."

Of course, the conception of the relation of landlord and tenant has undergone many changes since that case was decided in 1834. The rule asserted was founded upon the feudal law, as counsel in the case pointed out. Still, if the facts were strictly brought within the scope of the decision in Doe d. Ellerbrock v. Flynn,[3] I do not doubt that even today the court would follow it. But later, as Mr. Bridge very properly pointed out, in Doe d. Graves, Downe v. Wells,[4] Lord Denman C.J. pointed out that the rule stated in Doe d. Ellerbrock v. Flynn must be somewhat cautiously applied. He said[5]: "I "think Doe d. Ellerbrock v. Flynn[6] is distinguishable from the "present case. There it was thought that the tenant had "betrayed his landlord's interest by an act that might place "him in a worse condition: if the case went farther than that, "I should not think it maintainable. The other instances are "cases either of disclaimer upon record, which admit of no " doubt as to the nature of what is done, or of leases from year " to year, in speaking of which the nature of the tenancy has " been sometimes lost sight of, and the words ' forfeiture ' and " ' disclaimer ' have been improperly applied. It may be fairly " said, when a landlord brings an action to recover the possession " from a defendant who has been his tenant from year to year, " that evidence of a disclaimer of the landlord's title by the " tenant is evidence of the determination of the will of both " parties, by which the duration of the tenancy, from its par- " ticular nature, was limited. But no case, I think, goes so far " as the present: and I feel the danger of allowing an interest " in law to be put an end to by mere words."

Patteson J. observed [7]: " We know that mere words cannot " work a disseisin, although some acts have been held to work a " disseisin at the election of the party disseised, which, as against " him, would not work a disseisin."

In that case the tenant had in terms stated that he was the owner, and in his declaration repudiated the title of his lessor. Doe d. Graves, Downe v. Wells [8] was, it must be pointed out, not a case of a tenancy from year to year but of a term of years; and the passage I have read from the judgment of Lord Denman C.J. indicates that what is applicable to the one is not necessarily applicable to the other. Still, the principle, I think, as stated by Lord Denman C.J., is sound, namely, that it is somewhat dangerous to allow an interest at law to be put an end to by mere words; and, in effect, that, I think, would be the result if we were to accept Mr. Bridge's argument in the present case. Certainly, as it seems to me, the landlord, for practical purposes, was not put in any worse position by the transaction between the tenant and the defendant in 1952; and I for my part agree with the judge that in the end of all, when one is relying upon a disclaimer, it is a question of fact how far, properly interpreted, ought the transaction to be treated as having gone. Put interrogatively, in the language of Mr. Bridge's own formulation, can it be said here that the council proved (and clearly proved, because they are the plaintiffs, and the onus is upon them) that the tenant let the defendant into possession with the intention of enabling him to set up an adverse title?

As the judge put it, " It is, of course, true that a tenant's " denial of his landlord's title can give rise to forfeiture, and " the claim is none the less good for being rare and somewhat " archaic. But the denial, though it need not be express and can " be implied, must, nevertheless, be a clear denial and it must " be clearly proved." I entirely agree with those observations; and I agree, no less, with the sentence which follows: " I am " far from satisfied that any such denial, express or implied, " has in this case been proved."

WISBECH ST. MARY PARISH COUNCIL v. LILLEY.

In the result I, therefore, conclude that this appeal fails and must be dismissed.

BIRKETT L.J. I am entirely of the same opinion and there is really nothing on the main point to be added. There are one or two rather curious and obscure features of this case but, even if they were satisfactorily cleared up, I do not think it would affect in the smallest degree the essential point which has been dealt with by my Lord. For example, there was always an assessment, No. 564, upon this cottage; that was always available in the rate book; and the moment inquiries were made it was shown that the rates had always been paid by the council, and that the water rate had been paid by the council. Those two facts could have been ascertained at once, I should have thought. But, at any rate, however obscure and curious some of the features of the case may be, as I say, if they were cleared up it would not make any difference, I think, to the essential legal point.

I agree with the judgment of my Lord, and that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

ROMER L.J. I also agree. As Evershed M.R. has pointed out, the law on this subject is archaic in some degree and is founded upon feudal principles which certainly do not loom very large in modern life. But I accept Mr. Bridge's submission that, even now, if a tenant does in fact deliberately assert a title in himself adverse to his landlord, or if he lets a stranger into possession with the intention of enabling him to set up a title adverse to the landlord, then that amounts to a repudiation of the landlord's title; and it would seem that where the tenancy in question is a yearly tenancy it is sufficient to constitute a repudiation if the assertion of title against the landlord is made orally. But, as Evershed M.R. has pointed out, it is a question of fact as to what intention underlies the words or the actions of a tenant, as to whether in fact he is definitely asserting a title adverse to the landlord, or, as the case may be, intending to enable somebody else to set up such a title. I have no doubt but that this old gentleman, the tenant, had no such intention in his mind at all when he had this talk with Mr. Farrow and with the defendant. He thought, though wrongly, that he did not pay any rent, and that he had lived there for years without paying any rent. The judge came to the conclusion that all he had in mind was an intention to instruct the solicitor so that he could take such steps as were necessary to transfer such interest as the old man had in this property to the defendant, and the judge said that he believed that that was the intention of the tenant, which fell far short of an intended and definite assertion of an adverse title which is requisite to enable Mr. Bridge's clients to succeed. On that finding of the judge (with which, on the evidence, I entirely agree) it appears to me that the highly technical ground on which the council tried to succeed was of no avail; and I think the judge was right and that this appeal must fail.

By an agreement made in 1940 on dissolution of marriage, a husband covenanted to pay his former wife a monthly sum of £50. In 1952 the wife was adjudicated bankrupt; she obtained her discharge in 1955 subject to two years' suspension. The husband took out an interpleader summons asking for the direction of the court as to how, as between the wife and her trustee in bankruptcy, he should dispose of the monthly payments under the deed of 1940.

Held, (i) that the maintenance payments were "income" of which the wife was in receipt within the meaning of section 51 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914.

INTERPLEADER SUMMONS.

The bankrupt, an actress (professionally known as Miss Hermione Baddeley) was married to the applicant, David Francis Tennant, in 1928. That marriage was dissolved in 1937. By a deed of covenant date May 21, 1940, the applicant covenanted to pay Miss Baddeley the sum of £50 a month for her life. The deed contained provisions for security, and for the realization of that security if the applicant failed to make the monthly payments. That had not arisen.

On April 3, 1952, a receiving order was made on Miss Baddeley, and she was duly adjudicated bankrupt during 1952. On April 29, 1955, she was discharged from bankruptcy, subject to a suspension of two years. On her adjudication in 1952 Miss Baddeley had agreed that her trustee in bankruptcy should receive her maintenance payments for the benefit of her creditors as a voluntary gesture. Owing to her financial position in June 1955 she had given the trustee notice of revocation of that arrangement, which the trustee refused to accept.

The applicant took out this interpleader summons asking for the direction of the court as to how, as between Miss Baddeley and her trustee, he should dispose of the maintenance payments under the deed of 1940.

D. H. Mervyn Davies for the applicant.
Edward Grayson for Miss Baddeley.
Peter Oliver for the trustee in bankruptcy.

UPJOHN J. having stated the facts continued: The question is, as between Miss Baddeley and her trustee in bankruptcy, who is entitled to these payments at any rate until the discharge takes effect, and possibly for the rest of her life?

The trustee's claim is a perfectly simple one. He submits that under sections 18 and 38 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914,[1] all the property of the bankrupt is vested in him, and that, having regard to the very wide definition of property in section 167, the right of Miss Baddeley to receive for the rest of her life the monthly sum which the applicant had covenanted to pay vests in him. The trustee, therefore claims to be able to give a good receipt for it, to sell and realize it to the best advantage for the benefit of the creditors.

The claim put forward by Miss Baddeley is that under section 51 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914,[1] the property in question, that is the right to receive these monthly payments, vests in the trustee only subject to the right of the trustee to make an application for payment to him under that section. I must consider that section. [His Lordship read section 51 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, and continued:] The first question to be determined is whether the monthly sums payable under the deed of 1940 can properly be described as "a salary or income" for the purposes of subsection 2.

I shall not attempt any definition of what is meant by "salary or income" for the purposes of that subsection. It is clear that the phrase has a somewhat limited meaning. Indeed, Lord Esher, M.R., in In re Shine,[2] said this[3]: "We have held "that the word 'income,' as used in this section, [the predecessor "of section 51 (2)] does not mean all income, or all that property "of a man which is generally called his income; for, in most "cases, income of that kind would vest in the trustee on his "bankruptcy, and thus go to the creditors. But the Act assumes "that there is some income of a bankrupt which is not part of "his property so as to vest in the trustee in his bankruptcy".

It seems to me, however, that the matter is concluded in this court by the judgment of the Court of Appeal in In re Landau.[4] In that case, which was again concerned with a payment made on a divorce—it was made as an order of court but by consent—a substantial sum of about £1,800 per annum tax free was payable by the respondent to the petitioner, and it was held that that sum was "income" for the purposes of section 51 (2). Romer L.J.[5] said this: "The only other question which remains "is whether the payments in question in this case can properly "be described as income within the meaning of section 51 (2). I "confess that, even after hearing Mr. Tindale Davis's interesting "argument, I have not the least idea now why this annual sum "paid by the husband to the wife under the direction contained "in the order of the Divorce Court is not her income." Then he considered the judgment of Lord Esher in In re Hutton, Ex parte Benwell,[6] and continued: "in the passage read by the "Master of the Rolls [from Ex parte Benwell][6] the learned Lord "Justice [Cotton L.J.] said[7]: 'In my opinion section 90 points "'to some definite annual amount which is coming to the bank-"'rupt.' This £1,800 a year, free of tax, without any question "whatsoever is a definite annual amount coming to the bank-"rupt. That being so, it follows from the decision of Ex parte "Benwell,[8] if one wanted any authority for the proposition, that "this sum is income within the meaning of section 51 (2)." That covers this point on the summons. It cannot, for this purpose, make any difference that this sum is paid under an agreement in lieu of an application to the court for maintenance, and not under an agreement made in pursuance of an application to the court where the sum is agreed and contained in a consent order. It seems to me, therefore, that this is income within the meaning of section 51 (2).

If the matter were res integra it seems to me that there would be something to be said for the view that subsection (2) was referring to the case where the "income" or "salary," did not vest in the trustee in bankruptcy under the Bankruptcy Act: such, for instance, as a contract for personal services or possibly something as vague as future earnings or future salary, or something of that kind. Indeed that was the view taken in some of the earlier authorities, and if that was so, section 51 would not avail Miss Baddeley for, prima facie at all events, the right for this monthly sum vested in the trustee under sections 18 and 38. But it is plain that the later authorities take a different view, and that subsection (2) applies equally to income or salary which vests in the trustee as to income or salary which does not. Authority for that is again to be found in In re Landau.[9] In that case the argument, curiously enough, was that subsection (2) applied only to property which vested in the trustee and did not include property which did not vest in the trustee. That argument was rejected by the Court of Appeal. Slesser L.J. said this[10]: "yet nevertheless I am of opinion that later "authorities show quite clearly that even in the case of salary "or income which is not within sections 18 and 38, the court "has jurisdiction to make an order under section 51 where it is "salary or income within that section." That implies a fortiori that it did apply where the property vested under sections 18 and 38 of the Bankruptcy Act. It was put more succinctly by Romer L.J. in this way[11]: "Now it was held by Farwell J. in "In re Garrett[12] that section 51 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, "applies to property whether or not vested in the trustee. I "entirely agree with him. Farwell J. said, and said truly, that "that conclusion was amply justified by the decision of this "court in In re Shine.[13] I agree with that too, but I would add "this, that even in the absence of authority I should have arrived "at the same conclusion without any hesitation whatsoever."

The question is: How does subsection (2) work in any case where the trustee would prima facie seem to be in a position to claim that the property in question vested in him and ask the person bound to make these monthly payments to pay all future sums to him? The answer to that is to be found partly in a decision to which I will refer in a moment, and partly in the section itself. If one reads the subsection in the light of the authorities establishing that it applies to an income vested in the trustee in bankruptcy, the position is this: where a bankrupt is in receipt of a salary or income or is entitled to any part of it, the court, on the application of the trustee, shall make such order as it thinks fit for the payment of the salary to the trustee. That would seem to indicate that, although the right to the income vests in the trustee, he must, in order to reduce it into possession, obtain some order of the court in bankruptcy ordering that the income, or some part of it, be paid to him. It is noteworthy that only the trustee can make the application, the bankrupt has no such right.

That view is confirmed by the decision of the Court of Appeal in one of the earlier cases, In re Huggins, Ex parte Huggins,[14] where the trustee in bankruptcy made an application under section 90 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, the predecessor of section 51 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. The application was made in respect of a salary payable to the bankrupt as a retired judge of a Crown Colony; and it was held that that pension vested in the trustee. Sir George Jessel M.R., having held that the property vested in the trustee, said this[15]: "My view of the "meaning of the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act is this. "Sections 15 and 17" [the predecessors of sections 18 and 38 of the Act of 1914] "vest all the 'property' of the bankrupt in "the trustee, but this vesting is subject to exceptions such as "that which is made by section 23 of leases and onerous con- "tracts which the trustee is authorized to disclaim. The "'property' vests by virtue of sections 15 and 17, but subject "to the exceptions made by subsequent sections of the Act. The "series of sections beginning with section 87 and ending with "section 95, is prefaced by the words 'As to property devolving "'on trustee.' The proceeds of executions, which are dealt "with by section 87, would clearly vest in the trustee but for "the provisions of that section." Then he considers the case of a beneficed clergyman who may have the misfortune to become bankrupt, which I need not read. He refers then to section 89 (which is the predecessor of section 51 (1)), in regard to which he says[16]: "In such cases section 15 is controlled by section 89, "and a person who holds such a position and who becomes a "bankrupt, is not necessarily to be left to starve, however "improvident he may have been, but a discretion is given to "the court to fix how much of his pay and salary is to be made "available for the payment of his creditors. If this be so, why "do not the cases which are dealt with by section 90 stand in "a similar position? Section 90 applies to a bankrupt 'who is "'in the receipt of a salary or income other than as aforesaid.' "The present appellant's income is not a 'salary,' but it is "'income.' The word 'income' is as large a word as can be "used. It is not the less 'income,' because it has to be voted "every year by the Colonial Legislature. The court is "empowered to 'make such order as it thinks just for the pay- "'ment of such salary or income, or of any part thereof, to the "'trustee.' That means that, though the salary or income "would vest in the trustee by virtue of sections 15 and 17, the "court may order that only a part of it shall be set aside for "the benefit of the creditors. This is a specific provision which "to that extent controls the operation of sections 15 and 17. "I think, therefore, that the trustee in this case applied to the "court for the right order, i.e., for a declaration that the bank- "rupt's pension had vested in him, and then a direction what "proportion of it should be set aside for the payment of the "creditors."

TENNANT'S APPLICATION, In re.

In my judgment section 51 (2) controls the vesting of the property under sections 18 and 38, and that payment must necessarily be subject to an application by the trustee in bankruptcy for that purpose. The only way of giving effect to that, although the result is curious, is this: although the property vests in the trustee, it remains nevertheless payable to the bankrupt unless and until the trustee makes some application under the section. I propose to declare that the monthly sum of £50 continues to be payable to the bankrupt subject always to an application under section 51 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act by the trustee asking for payment to him of the monthly sum or some part thereof.

Declaration accordingly.

Criminal Law — Larceny — Simple larceny — Common law offence — Reference in charge to Larceny Act, 1916 (6 & 7 Geo. 5, c. 50), s. 2.

"Simple" larceny is an offence at common law, but reference to section 2 of the Larceny Act, 1916, when it is charged does not make the charge bad.

LORD GODDARD C.J. I desire to refer briefly to Reg. v. Bryant,[1] heard before the Courts-Martial Appeal Court on May 9, 1955, when Hallett and Byrne JJ. were sitting with me. We understand that the decision has caused some difficulty to clerks to justices, and those who have to prepare charges and indictments, and we desire to give a short explanation of the decision which we think will clear up any difficulty that may be felt.

The argument for the appellant in that case was, that as section 18 of the Army Act provided a special punishment for the stealing of military property, the accused could not be charged, as he was, with stealing contrary to section 2 of the Larceny Act. We pointed out that section 2 is concerned with punishment and does not create the offence of larceny which is and always has been a crime at common law, though the punishment has varied from time to time. The effect of the section is that for any larceny for which no special punishment is provided the maximum sentence is 5 years' imprisonment. If, then, a person is charged merely with larceny he cannot receive a heavier sentence, but if charged or indicted with larceny from the person or from a dwelling-house, to take two instances, he is liable to heavier punishment. We did not say, nor did we intend to say, that in civilian courts the addition of the words "contrary to section 2 of the Larceny Act" is improper, though if all that is intended is to charge a simple and not a compound or aggravated larceny these words are in truth surplusage. That this was the opinion of that great authority on the criminal law, Sir James Fitzjames Stephen, is clear from page 47 of volume III of his History of the Criminal Law, where he said that the expression "simple larceny," which first appeared in sections 2 and 4 of the Larceny Act, 1861, obscured those provisions and had no definite meaning. At the same time it is unobjectionable, and indeed convenient, to refer to section 2 where a simple charge of larceny is preferred, as it serves to direct the attention of the court to the fact that the charge is not one of compound or aggravated larceny, and to the punishment which the offence charged carries. The reference to the section does not make the indictment bad and, equally, if the indictment charged larceny contrary to the common law it would be good, but the sentence could not exceed 5 years even if the evidence disclosed a compound larceny.

It is true that schedule 1 of the Magistrates' Courts Act, which enumerates the indictable offences which can be tried summarily, refers among others to offences under section 2, but that must be taken to mean that a larceny for which no special punishment is provided is one of the offences which can be dealt with summarily. If, then, for the words in the penultimate sentence of the report "as it is proper to charge him in this "country" are substituted "as he might have been charged "in this country," we think that any difficulty or misunderstanding will be dispelled. I make this statement with the concurrence of Hallett and Byrne JJ., the members of the court who are sitting today, and Havers and Ashworth JJ. who would have been sitting if the court of five judges fixed for today had become effective.

National Insurance — Contributions — Failure to pay — Conviction for failing to pay one contribution—Order for payment of arrears— National Insurance (Contributions) Regulations, 1948 (S.I. 1948, No. 1417), reg. 19 (1) (3) (5).

The defendant pleaded guilty to the offence of failing to pay a contribution which he was liable to pay under the National Insurance Act, 1946, as a self-employed person, contrary to section 2 (6). The prosecutor, having served with the summons a notice of intention to prove the defendant's failure to pay other contributions, proved at the hearing that the defendant had failed to pay contributions amounting to £17 8s. 7d. The prosecutor asked the justices to make two orders, one, under regulation 19 (1) of the National Insurance (Contributions) Regulations, 1948, ordering the defendant to pay to the National Insurance Fund 7s. 5d. in respect of the contribution for which he had been convicted, and the other under regulation 19 (3) ordering the defendant to pay £17 8s. 7d. in respect of the arrears of contributions. The justices refused on the ground that they had no power to make the orders. On appeal:—

Held, that since the defendant was liable to pay the contributions under regulation 19, the justices had power, on the failure to pay the contributions having been proved, to make the orders both under paragraph (1) and paragraph (3).

CASE STATED by Sutton Coldfield justices.

An information was preferred by Ashleigh Kenneth Shilvock against the defendant, Thomas Booth, charging him with failing to pay a contribution in respect of the week commencing May 16, 1955, which he was liable to pay under the National Insurance Act, 1946, as a self-employed person, contrary to section 2 (6).

At the hearing of the information the defendant pleaded guilty to the offence and was duly convicted, and the justices then found the following facts. A summons was issued in respect of the information and duly served on the defendant together with a notice dated August 16, 1955, under regulation 19 of the National Insurance (Contributions) Regulations, 1948,[1] to the effect that in the event of the defendant being convicted,

[1] National Insurance (Contributions) Regulations, 1948, reg. 19: "(1) In any case where . . . an insured person has been convicted of the offence under subsection (6) of section 2 of the Act of failing to pay a contribution, he shall be liable to pay to the National Insurance Fund a sum equal to the amount which he failed to pay. . . . (3) On any such conviction . . . if notice of intention to do so has been served with the summons or warrant, evidence may be given— . . . (b) in the case of an insured person (other than an employed person), of the failure on his part to pay other contributions as such an insured person during those two years; and on proof of such failure . . . the insured person shall be liable to pay to the National Insurance Fund . . . a sum equal to the total of all the contributions under the Act . . . which he is so proved to have failed to pay. . . . (5) Any sum ordered to be paid to the National Insurance Fund . . . under this regulation shall be recoverable as a penalty."

it was intended to give evidence of his failure to pay other contributions, therein specified, amounting to £17 8s. 7d. The defendant had not paid 7s. 5d. in respect of his contribution as a self-employed person for the week commencing May 16, 1955, and he was liable to pay that sum to the National Insurance Fund; nor had he paid £17 8s. 7d. in respect of the arrears and he was liable also to pay that sum to the fund.

It was contended by the prosecutor that the justices had jurisdiction to make two orders; one, under regulation 19 (1) ordering the defendant to pay 7s. 5d. in respect of the contribution which he was liable to pay for the week commencing May 16, and the other under regulation 19 (3) ordering the defendant to pay £17 8s. 7d. in respect of the arrears of contributions during the period between September 21, 1953, and May 15, 1955, as set out in the notice, and that the justices were under a duty to make such orders on proof that the defendant had failed to pay such contribution and arrears of contributions respectively.

The defendant, who was not represented, offered no observations.

The justices were of the opinion that they had no jurisdiction to make the orders. The provision in regulation 19 that in certain circumstances an insured person "shall be liable to "pay" in their opinion confirmed the view that there was no pre-existing liability on which an order for payment could be made and that the liability only arose on proof being given, after conviction, of failure or neglect to pay. If there had been a pre-existing liability the words "shall be liable to pay" would have no meaning. The authorities showed that the liability to pay was a civil and not a criminal obligation and there was nothing in regulation 19 or in the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, nor in the Magistrates' Courts Rules, 1952, to confer jurisdiction on a magistrates' court in connexion with making an order for payment of a civil debt on proceedings on an information for a criminal offence. Nowhere in the National Insurance (Contributions) Regulations, 1948, was to be found the expression "the "Court may order the defendant to pay" or any similar expression. The amount which an insured person was liable to pay could, under section 54 of the National Insurance Act, 1946, be recovered summarily before justices on complaint and after due service of a summons thereon. Section 47 (3) of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, required the service of a summons issued on a complaint, before a magistrates' court could make an order for the payment of a civil debt. The notice served under regulation 19 was neither a complaint nor a summons and therefore they had no power to make the order.

The prosecutor appealed.

The defendant did not appear and was not represented.

SHILVOCK v. BOOTH.

LORD GODDARD C.J. This is a case stated by the justices for the Borough of Sutton Coldfield, before whom the respondent was charged with failing to make an insurance contribution under the National Insurance Act, 1946, and the simple question raised is whether the justices have not only power to order him to pay the contribution in respect of which he was expressly summoned, but other contributions which stood in exactly the same position and which he ought to have paid and had not.

The matter turns on the true construction of regulation 19 of the National Insurance (Contributions) Regulations, 1948. Under the National Insurance Act, 1946, a self-employed person is liable to pay contributions and if he fails to pay contributions for which he is liable, there is a penalty not exceeding £10 for any contribution which he fails to pay. For the purpose of collecting those contributions, section 8 (1) of the Act provides: "Regulations may provide—(a) for any matters incidental to the "payment and collection of contributions under this Act, includ- "ing the co-ordination thereof with the payment and collection "of contributions under the Industrial Injuries Act. . ." Then the regulations of 1948 make provision for the recovery of contributions.

[His Lordship read regulation 19 and continued:] That seems to me to be so far a perfectly intelligible provision. It is akin to the practice of taking into account other offences. They say: "We summon you for one offence and at the same time we "serve on you a notice telling you that if you are convicted of "that offence, which will establish your liability, we shall ask for "an order on you to pay all these other contributions which you "have not paid." It is really done, I think, not only to save time, but expense and various other things because if a man has not paid, for example, 20 contributions, he might take the point, "I am not liable to pay." If it is established that he is liable on one of these occasions, then it follows that he ought to have paid and might be liable to be prosecuted for every one of them, and he would be held liable by the justices to pay.

Regulation 19 having provided that on proof of such failure the insured person should be liable to pay the amount, it is then provided in paragraph (5) "Any sum ordered to be paid to the "National Insurance Fund . . . under this regulation shall be "recoverable as a penalty"; in other words, the amount shall be recovered in the same way as the fine is recovered.

I fully realise the trouble the justices and their clerk have taken over this case, and if they have doubts on a point of law it is very desirable that they should express them; but I venture to think that they have imagined difficulties which do not really exist. A statute or regulation very often says that a person who fails to do something shall be liable to a fine; that means he will be fined. If he is liable to pay, that means he can be told he must pay. He is liable to pay these contributions as he is liable to pay the fine; and although it might be the draftsman might have put "On proof of such failure the insured person "shall be ordered to pay", I think it is clear enough that that is what is meant, that is to say, it is a summary and cheap method of recovering these contributions without further proceedings.

SHILVOCK v. BOOTH.

Lord Goddard C.J.

For these reasons, I think the justices came to a wrong decision, and this case must go back telling them that it is their duty to make an order that the respondent should pay the contributions which it has been proved he has failed to pay, by such instalments as the justices may order.

The plaintiff, a girl aged 18 years, who was employed by the defendants at their factory, was engaged in cutting lengths of timber by means of a circular saw, and having cut a number of such lengths was removing, by means of a short stick, some off-cuts from the side of the bench, where they had accumulated, when her fingers came into contact with the revolving saw some inches of which were exposed and she sustained injuries. It was admitted by counsel for the plaintiff, and so found by the trial judge, that the saw had been fenced in accordance with the requirements of regulation 10 (c) of the Woodworking Machinery Regulations, 1922,[1] but the plaintiff contended that the defendants were in breach of their common law duty to safeguard their employees, because at the side of the machine from which the off-cuts had to be removed some inches of the revolving saw were exposed. Oliver J. held that the defendants were in breach of their statutory duty under section 14 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937,[2] and he awarded the plaintiff damages. On appeal:—

Held, that regulation 10 (c) modified the provisions of section 14 of the Act in respect of circular saws and substituted the guarding and fencing prescribed by the regulation for the otherwise absolute obligation imposed by section 14.

Held, further, that the requirements of regulation 10 (c) having admittedly been complied with the defendants owed no statutory duty under section 14 of the Factories Act, 1937, but a new trial must be ordered to determine whether they were in breach of their common law duty to protect their employee against dangers not covered by the regulation.

Decision of Oliver J. [1955] 1 W.L.R. 971 reversed.

APPEAL from Oliver J., sitting at Liverpool Assizes.[3]

The plaintiff, a girl, 18 years of age, who was employed by the defendants at their furniture factory, had worked for about six months at a circular saw, and on January 7, 1954, was using the saw to cut timber to make chair legs. The saw had been set up and fenced for the purpose of cutting the timber so as to comply with regulation 10 of the Woodworking Machinery Regulations, 1922–1945. The timber to be cut by the plaintiff was in proper sized pieces and was placed upon and held tightly against a jig so that it was presented to the teeth of the circular saw and cut into particular lengths. After cutting each length of timber a piece of wood, called an off-cut, remained on the bench at the side of the saw after the saw had passed through the timber. The plaintiff was engaged in removing the off-cuts from the bench in the manner in which she had been trained, i.e., she moved to the side of the saw and, using her push-stick, flicked away the off-cuts whilst the saw was in motion. While so engaged her fingers came into contact with the saw and she sustained injuries. The plaintiff, suing by her father, brought this action claiming damages for personal injuries, leave being given at the hearing to amend the statement of claim so as to allege a breach by the defendants of the duty imposed upon them by section 14 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937.

Breach of a common law duty to take steps to safeguard their employee was also alleged against the defendants.

[2] Factories Act, 1937, s. 14 (1): "Every dangerous part of any "machinery . . . shall be securely "fenced . . . Provided that, in so "far as the safety of a dangerous "part of any machinery cannot by "reason of the nature of the opera-"tion be secured by means of a fixed "guard, the requirements of this "subsection shall be deemed to have "been complied with if a device is "provided which automatically pre-"vents the operator from coming into "contact with that part."

STRINGER v. AUTOMATIC WOOD-TURNING CO. LTD.

Oliver J. held that if the plaintiff had been injured while she was sawing wood the defendants would have been protected by the regulation, but that the removing of off-cuts, while directly ancillary to such work, was not the job of sawing wood and that it was the duty of the defendants to comply with section 14 (1) of the Act of 1937, and notwithstanding that the defendants had provided a fence complying with the regulation, they were in breach of the duty imposed on them by the subsection. He therefore awarded the plaintiff damages. He did not in his judgment deal with the question of common law negligence.

The defendants appealed.

H. I. Nelson Q.C. and J. M. Davies for the defendants
G. G. Blackledge Q.C. and J. M. Kennan for the plaintiff.

Cases cited in argument are referred to in the judgment.

SINGLETON L.J., having stated the facts and read the trial judge's description of the machine, the work performed by the plaintiff, and also the material regulation and section, continued: The plaintiff and her advisers having abandoned any claim for breach of the regulation, I do not think that this court ought to go behind that, and it is right to say that we have not been asked to do so. Counsel for the plaintiff preferred to put her claim as one of negligence under the common law.

The case for the defendants is that once it is admitted that there was compliance by them with the regulations no question can arise under section 14 of the Factories Act, 1937. That submission was based upon the decision of this court in Miller v. Boothman & Sons Ltd.[1] The headnote reads: "Section 14 "(1), of the Factories Act, 1937, enacts that: 'Every dangerous "'part of any machinery . . . shall be securely fenced'. "Regulation 10 of the Woodworking Machinery Regulations, "1922, prescribes a certain form of fencing for circular saws. "The plaintiff was injured in operating a circular saw belonging "to his employers, the defendants. The fencing of the saw did "not comply with the sub-section, but did comply with the "regulation". It was held that the regulation which was deemed to be made under the Act modified section 14, subsection (1), and, accordingly, that the defendants had not committed a breach of a statutory obligation, and were not liable to the plaintiff.

The judgment of this court was given by Goddard L.J. who said[1]: "By section 159 of the Act of 1937 these regulations "continue in force, notwithstanding the repeal of the earlier "Act, and have effect as though made under the present Act, "that is, under section 60. They contain detailed provisions in "regulation 10 for the guarding of circular saws, hand saws and " planing machines. In our opinion, these regulations must be " regarded as modifying the provisions of section 14 in respect " of these machines and of substituting the prescribed guarding " and fencing for the absolutely secure fencing which the " section would otherwise require. It is difficult, indeed, to see " what other object these regulations could have. They clearly " contemplate the use of these saws. If saws are securely " fenced as required by section 14 they could not be dangerous " to life or limb, and, indeed, could not be used at all. The " use in section 60 subsection (1) of the words ' as appear to him " to be reasonably practicable and to meet the necessity of the " case ' we think clearly shows that it is intended to give the " Secretary of State power to modify the otherwise absolute " obligation so as to allow the use of the machine, provided " that reasonable, though not absolute, provision for safety is " made ". That decision was approved in the House of Lords in John Summers & Sons Ltd. v. Frost.[2] Mr. Nelson claims that section 14 of the Act does not apply in the circumstances of this case.

Oliver J. took a different view. Having found that this saw was properly set up within the Woodworking Regulation No. 10, the judge said[3]: " If the plaintiff had been injured while she " was sawing timber, nothing more would be said about it— " she would be quite clearly within the ruling of Miller v. " Boothman[4]; but she was not sawing wood. It seems to me " that this case is exactly the same as if she had left the saw " running and some other employee had come in contact with " it unfenced; I do not see any difference. It is quite true that " the moving of off-cuts is directly ancillary to the job of sawing; " but it is not the job of sawing. I find no difficulty in saying " that a saw may be correctly fenced for the purpose of operation " as a saw, but not correctly fenced for some other purpose. I " find full support for that proposition in two cases—Dickson v. " Flack[5] and Benn v. Kamm & Co. Ltd.[6] " The judge held that the defendants were in breach of section 14 of the Act of 1937, and that the plaintiff was entitled to damages subject to the question of contributory negligence.

The facts in Benn v. Kamm & Co. Ltd.[6] appear from the headnote, which reads: " Although special regulations made by " the Secretary of State under section 60 of the Factories Act, " 1937, with respect to the fencing of specified parts of a par- " ticular machine, may modify the duties imposed by section 14 " of the Act on the occupier of the factory with respect to the " fencing of those parts, they do not affect his duty to comply " with the provisions of that section as regards the fencing of " other dangerous parts of the machine with which the special "regulations do not purport to deal. The plaintiff was injured "by a dangerous and unfenced part of a horizontal milling "machine, to which the Horizontal Milling Machine Regulations, "1928, applied. Regulation 3 contained provisions concerning "the fencing of the cutters of the machine, but made no refer- "ence to the fencing of the dangerous part by which the plaintiff "was injured. Held, that regulation 3 did not define exhaustively "the duty of the occupier of the factory to fence horizontal "machines and the defendants were in breach of section 14 of "the Act, and the plaintiff was entitled to recover." Miller v. Boothman & Sons Ltd.[7] was distinguished.

In the course of his judgment in Benn v. Kamm & Co. Ltd. Somervell L.J. said[8]: "Mr. McIntyre, for the plaintiff, submits "that they do not exhaustively define the occupier's duty, and "that so far as fencing is concerned they define and regulate only "the fencing that is necessary for the cutter, and that if, as here, "there is on a milling machine, as there is here found to be, a "dangerous part other than the cutter, that is a subject-matter "with which the regulations do not purport to deal and the "general duty under section 14 is applicable. I have come to the "conclusion that that is right." Denning L.J. is recorded as having said[8]: "I am confirmed in the view that we should allow "this appeal because Parker J. would have himself decided in "favour of the plaintiff but for the fact that he felt himself "bound by authority. He said: 'it seems an extraordinary "'proposition that because the regulations have said that "'dangerous part A shall be guarded in a particular way, there "'is no obligation to guard dangerous parts B, C, D and E.' "Now that we have had the benefit of full argument on the "cases, I think that proposition is no part of the law. It seems "to me that when the regulations say, that a particular dangerous "part is to be guarded in a particular way, then the occupier "satisfies his statutory obligations in regard to that part by "guarding it in that way; but the occupier remains under his "ordinary statutory obligations in regard to other dangerous "parts."

In the present case we are dealing with a circular saw, and with nothing else. But for the regulations, section 14 of the Act would have applied. If the regulations apply to the saw, they modify the obligation of the employers. The employers fulfilled their duty in regard to the circular saw if they provided that which they had to provide under the regulations as a guard for the circular saw, and under the decision in Miller v. Boothman & Sons Ltd.[9] section 14 of the Act did not apply.

It appears to me, if I may say so with respect, that Oliver J. was not right in saying that on the facts of this case section 14 of the Act still applied—if it be right to say that the defendants complied with the regulation. It follows that I think

Mr. Nelson's point is sound and that there ought not to have been a decision in favour of the plaintiff on an alleged breach of section 14 of the Act once it was found or admitted that there had been full compliance with the regulation.

[His Lordship then considered the plaintiff's claim for breach of common law duty and continued:] There are features of this case which are unsatisfactory in a sense. I am satisfied that the correct way for this court to deal with it is to direct that there be a new trial upon the issue as to negligence or breach of duty under the common law. It appears to me from the words used by the learned judge himself that this is a case well worthy of consideration upon that head. I think further that as the case should go back for that purpose, it should be open to the judge, upon trial, when he has evidence from both sides about it, to consider to what extent (if any) it can be said that the plaintiff herself brought about this accident. In view of the admission by the plaintiff that the regulations were complied with by the defendants I do not think that the plaintiff ought to be at liberty to go into that question again. But for the purpose of ascertaining the true position between the parties the whole of the facts should be open to the judge on the new trial. I would allow the appeal accordingly and direct a new trial.

JENKINS L.J. I agree that there should be a new trial in this case on the issue of breach of common law duty, or in other words the issue of negligence. Like my Lord I have had great difficulty in relating the requirements of regulation 10 (c) of the Woodworking Machinery Regulations of 1922 to the physical characteristics of the circular saw with which this case is concerned, so far as those characteristics can be discerned and appreciated merely by inspecting certain photographs with such assistance as counsel have been able to give. But the case proceeded below upon an admission on the plaintiff's side that the fencing and guarding of this circular saw did comply with regulation 10 (c). It was not sought to retract this admission before us, and I think that the plaintiff must be regarded as bound by it. On the footing that as regards fencing and guarding the saw did comply with the requirements of regulation 10 (c) I think it follows from the principle stated in Miller v. Boothman & Sons Ltd.[10] and approved by the House of Lords in John Summers & Sons Ld. v. Frost[11] that the plaintiff cannot succeed on the ground of breach by the defendants of their statutory obligation to fence under section 14 of the Factories Act, 1937. These cases seem to me to provide clear authority for the proposition that the obligation of a special regulation, such as regulation 10 (c) of the Woodworking Machinery Regulations in the present case, where such special regulation has been duly complied with, is to be regarded as substituted for the more general obligation as to fencing contained in section 14 of the Act.

I need say no more about the authorities, to which my Lord has fully referred, except to mention with regard to Dickson v. Flack [12]—one of the cases referred to by the learned judge—that it seems to me that the observations attributed to my Lord and Denning L.J. in the headnote might appear to go rather further than Benn v. Kamm [13] and to be not altogether easy to reconcile with the principle of Miller v. Boothman & Sons Ltd.[10] But when the judgments are looked into, it seems to me to be clear that neither of their Lordships was really doing any more than applying the principle in Benn v. Kamm,[13] which is in no way inconsistent with the principle stated in Miller v. Boothman & Sons Ltd.,[10] but merely says that compliance with a special regulation as regards the fencing of some specific dangerous part of a machine does not absolve the employer from taking proper steps under section 14 of the Act to fence some other part of the machine for which no provision is made in the special regulation.

Accordingly, in my view, if this case rested only upon alleged breach of statutory duty, the judge's decision could not stand, and the defendants would be entitled to succeed in this appeal. But the case turns not only on breach of statutory duty (as to which the plaintiff's case must fail) but also on the defendants' common law duty to the plaintiff and their other employees, not to expose them to unnecessary risk, and to take all such steps as are reasonably practicable for their safety. That ground—that is to say the alleged breach of the common law duty—actually on the course that the case took below formed the main, and at one stage in the case the only, basis of the plaintiff's claim. The judge never in terms adjudicated upon it so far as one can tell from the judgment. We were told that in the course of the argument he made some observation from which it was inferred that he did not consider that that basis of claim could succeed. But the question was somewhat obscured by the introduction into the case of the claim which ultimately succeeded, namely, the claim under section 14 of the Factories Act, 1937, which was introduced by the judge himself.

In the result there is nothing in the reasons for his judgment to show that he had reached a final decision one way or the other upon the issue of common law negligence. [His Lordship referred to the trial judge's findings as to the danger to which the plaintiff was exposed and concluded:] It is obvious to my mind that the judge did not give adequate consideration to this aspect of the case, no doubt because the view which he formed on the application of section 14 of the Factories Act made it unnecessary to go into it for the purpose of his decision. In the result I agree with my Lord that there should be a new trial on the issue of negligence at common law at which, while the plaintiff must be considered as bound by the admission made as regards compliance with regulation 10, it should be open to the parties to call all such evidence relevant to the issue of negligence at common law as they may be advised.

HODSON L.J. I agree that there should be a new trial on the question of common law negligence. The case was presented on that footing in part, and the common law claim was never abandoned. Although in the course of speeches of counsel the judge made an observation which discouraged the plaintiff's counsel from pursuing the argument based on the common law claim, he never in his judgment dealt expressly with this claim, having made up his mind that he could find in favour of the plaintiff on another ground. I agree with my Lords that insofar as the judge found himself able so to do—namely, to find in favour of the plaintiff by reason of the breach of statutory duty under section 14 of the Factories Act, 1937—he was in error.

The first regulation which he had to consider in deciding whether or not the defendants had been guilty of a breach was regulation 10 (c) of the Woodworking Machinery Regulations. These regulations, and the sections of the Factories Act generally, when they deal with fences, deal with fences which are designed to protect the workman from danger. That is true of section 14 of the Factories Act, which requires that dangerous machinery shall be securely fenced. When one looks at the Woodworking Regulations, regulation 10 begins with the words: "Every circular saw shall be fenced as follows." But when one comes to the regulation under consideration, regulation 10 (c), one finds that it is possible that the word "fence" is used in a different sense; and indeed the plaintiff, through her counsel, accepted that the word "fence" in regulation 10 (c) was used in a different sense—that is to say, it did not mean something to protect the workmen from danger, but it referred to a standard part of a circular saw table which in this case was a rectangular piece of wood or metal (I know not which) which appears on one of the photographs at a distance of 2 ft. from the saw itself, and it was there not for protection, but as a guide for the purpose of holding the wood, and a moveable guide at that.

Reading the regulation in that sense, which the plaintiff admitted against herself, her counsel very naturally and properly, as I see it, at the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence, came to the conclusion that no breach of regulation 10 (c) could be established because the circular saw in question was guarded in accordance with the regulation on what I will call the near-side of the circular saw—that is to say, the side from which the wood was fed to the machine—and on that reading of the regulation that is all that is required. That leaves what I will call the off-side of the saw exposed, and, so far as the regulation goes, no necessity for a flange protection on the off-side of the saw;

STRINGER v. AUTOMATIC WOOD-TURNING CO. LTD.
Hodson L.J.

although one of the photographs which was shown to the judge reveals the dangerous effect of the exposure of a number of teeth on the off-side of the saw. It may be that when the operator has to work only on the near-side of the saw, compliance with this regulation will be sufficient to protect the operator from danger. But when, as in this case, one finds that part of the operator's duty is to go round to the off-side (that is, the unprotected side of the saw) to remove the off-cuts from the table, there is no sufficient protection provided by the regulation. So that it would look as if there is a gap to be filled in that regulation, and that some amendment of it would be desirable.

The position of this court I think is this: Although in many cases where dangerous operations are covered by regulations, compliance with the regulations would absolve an employer from liability in the case of accident, yet the common law is not helpless to fill up gaps, because the duty of the employer remains. The duty is not to expose his employees to unnecessary risk, and that duty is not ousted by regulations.

The plaintiff, having accepted that there was no breach of regulation 10 (c) of the Woodworking Regulations, was in the position that she was thrown back upon her common law claim because regulation 10 (c), so far as the protection of the saw is concerned, is exhaustive and does oust the provisions of section 14 of the Factories Act, as was explained by Goddard L.J. in Miller v. Boothman & Sons Ltd.,[14] in the passage which was expressly approved by the House of Lords in John Summers & Sons v. Frost.[15] I respectfully disagree with the learned judge when he felt himself able to distinguish Miller v. Boothman & Sons Ltd.[14] on the ground that the plaintiff was not actually engaged in the operation of sawing, but of clearing the off-cuts from the table which was ancillary to the sawing. I see no valid distinction there, but I appreciate the way in which the judge may well have been misled by the headnote in Dickson v. Flack,[16] to which my Brother Jenkins referred, because the headnote in that case certainly seems to suggest that both Singleton and Denning L.JJ., in purporting to follow the decision in Benn v. Kamm,[17] nevertheless went in the face of Miller v. Boothman & Sons Ltd.[14] in saying that in certain circumstances the regulations might not be exhaustive, and the court might be thrown back on considering the duty to fence securely imposed by section 14 (1) of the Act of 1937. That this is not so is quite clear on reference to the judgments of both learned Lords Justices, who say in terms that they were dealing only with the situation where the regulation did not cover all the dangerous parts.

In Dickson v. Flack[18] Singleton L.J. said "Unless the "regulation covers all those parts section 14 comes into play."

STRINGER v. AUTOMATIC WOODTURNING CO. LTD.
Hodson L.J.

Denning L.J. said: "The dangerous part provided for by regulation 17 is the part of the table where the man's hand is likely to come into contact with the cutters while he is doing his work. The regulation does not provide for the gap in the machine above the cutter where it may fly out and thus cause danger. That is another dangerous part. It falls within section 14, and must be securely fenced." So that when one looks at the judgments in that case, one finds no support for the proposition that one can fall back, as it were, on section 14 in such a case as this, because the protection of the circular saw itself is covered by the Woodworking Regulation which does modify the Act, as was recognised as being perfectly feasible in Miller v. Boothman & Sons Ltd.[19]

For these reasons, therefore, I agree with Mr. Nelson's submission for the appellant that the judge was wrong in finding himself able, upon the amended claim, to find the defendants' guilty of breach of statutory duty by reference to section 14 (1) of the Factories Act. Regulation 10 (c) was, according to the admission made by the plaintiff, complied with; and so far as the regulations are concerned, I think the defendants are entitled to succeed. The question of common law liability I need not elaborate because I agree entirely with what has been already said on the subject. I agree that the appeal should be allowed and with the order proposed.

Appeal allowed; new trial ordered.

CHANDRIS v. UNION OF INDIA.

"in shifting, discharging and/or reloading any cargo . . . for the "purpose of putting the vessel into seaworthy trim for the passage "to the second port . . . shall be paid by the charterers. . . . In "the event of the cargo being a homogeneous cargo (i.e. of the same "description quality and mark) the master shall discharge the "cargo in such manner as to leave the vessel in seaworthy trim to "proceed to the second port of discharge."

Under a charterparty incorporating the seaworthy trim clause and other clauses providing for loss of time, a shipowner agreed to carry a cargo of wheat from the Argentine to India. The wheat was all of the same quality and bore no mark or special description. The charterers elected to load it in bulk, but the ship's master required part of it to be supplied in bags. The charterers, who had an option of requiring discharge at two ports, exercised it during the voyage, and part of the cargo was discharged at Cochin and the rest at Bombay. The part discharge at Cochin was completed at 4.30 p.m. on a Saturday, but the ship did not sail for Bombay until 21 hours later owing to the necessity for putting her into seaworthy trim. That involved, inter alia, wages for crew's overtime in shifting the ship and superintending the restowage of the cargo.

The shipowner claimed as "expense" under the seaworthy trim clause (a) moneys spent on crew's overtime and (b) an amount for loss of 21 hours ship's time. She claimed alternatively demurrage and/or damages for detention, calculated by agreement on the basis of the demurrage rate of £200 for 24 hours, which figure was also agreed as a reasonable amount for damages for detention, if any. The charterers denied liability.

Devlin J. held that "any expense" in the seaworthy trim clause included crew's overtime and loss of 21 hours' ship's time, and awarded the shipowner £175 for that loss of time, based on the agreed figure for demurrage or damages.

On appeal by the charterers:—

Held, per totam curiam (1) that on the agreed facts and the terms of the charterparty the claims for demurrage and damages failed.

(2) That, affirming Devlin J., the cargo of wheat partly in bulk and partly in bags was not a homogeneous cargo for the purposes of the seaworthy trim clause and the definition of "homogeneous "cargo" therein;

(3) That the crew's overtime was an "expense" recoverable by the shipowner under the seaworthy trim clause, albeit that the crew was occupied not in shifting the cargo but in shifting the ship and superintending the restowage of the cargo.

(4) Per Denning and Hodson L.JJ., reversing Devlin J., that the shipowner could not recover for loss of ship's time as "any "expense incurred in shifting the cargo" under the seaworthy trim clause. The words "any expense" in this clause must be construed in their primary meaning of actual disbursements, and should not be given the wider meaning to include the whole cost of running the ship and consequent loss to the owner during the period of delay; a fortiori since the charterparty expressly provided elsewhere for time occupied and time lost.

Per Morris L.J. The shipowners were entitled to receive as "any expense" under the clause a sum representing the expense necessarily and solely incurred at Cochin in shifting the cargo, which sum should include the expense of running and maintaining the ship while shifting the cargo and carrying out operations incidental to the trimming of the ship; but that the phrase "any "expense incurred" did not cover loss of time as such nor loss of shipowner's profit or loss of earnings; and, accordingly, the amount to which the shipowner was entitled could not be measured on the basis of the demurrage rate nor by reference to what would be a reasonable figure of damages for detention. Calculation of the amount would necessitate further inquiry.

Decision of Devlin J. reversed in part.

APPEAL from Devlin J.

The facts taken from the agreed statement of facts and the judgments in the Court of Appeal were as follows:—By a charterparty dated September 15, 1948, between the agents for the shipowner, Mrs. Evgenia John Chandris (widow) and the charterers, Union of India, respectively, the owner agreed to carry in her steamship the "Evgenia Chandris" a full and complete cargo of wheat in bags and/or bulk to be loaded in the Argentine, the charterers having the option of discharging at two safe ports on the same coast of the Dominion of India, in which case the rate of freight was to be 2s. 6d. per ton more on the entire cargo. The charterers elected to load in bulk, but no shifting boards were erected, and accordingly in order to comply with the provisions for safe stowage contained in the charterparty, the master required that ten per cent. of the cargo of wheat should be supplied in bags; and accordingly 9,000 tons were loaded in bulk, and 1,000 tons in bags. All the wheat was of the same quality and bore no mark or special description.

The option of ordering the vessel to discharge was not exercised before loading began, but it was exercised on November 5, 1948, during the voyage, by an instruction to the master to discharge 2,900 tons of the cargo at Cochin and the remainder at Bombay. The vessel arrived at Cochin on November 25, 1948. Notice of readiness to discharge was given by 1 p.m. and discharge and the lay days began at that hour. The physical discharge of the 2,900 tons of wheat, all in bulk, was completed at 4.30 p.m. on Saturday, November 27, 1948; but the master was unable to sail immediately for Bombay because the removal of the 2,900 tons of bulk wheat had left the ship out of trim, and it was necessary to trim the rest of the wheat in the ship. The port authorities would not allow the ship to remain at the wharf at Cochin while this was being done, and in order to comply with their requirements the ship had to shift from the wharf at which discharge had taken place to a buoy in the stream. The shifting occupied two hours, from 4.30 p.m. to 6.30 p.m. on the Saturday. From that hour until 6 a.m. on Sunday, November 28, the time was occupied in trimming bulk wheat into the lower holds, covering it with tarpaulins, and stacking bagged wheat over it. The work was passed by the port authorities at midday on Sunday. A pilot boarded the ship at 1 p.m. and the ship sailed for Bombay at 1.30 p.m. The ship had thus been delayed for 21 hours owing to the necessity for putting her into seaworthy trim.

Clause 43 of the charterparty provided as follows:—"... Orders for second port of discharge to be given whilst

CHANDRIS 1956 v. UNION OF INDIA.

" vessel is discharging at first port. Ports to be in geographical " rotation and the Seaworthy Trim Clause as per lines 38–43 of " the ' Austral ' charterparty to apply to this charter." Lines 38–43 of the " Austral " charterparty provide: " Safe trim between " ports of discharge. If the option of ordering the vessel to " discharge at two ports is not exercised, or if correct particulars " of the cargo to be discharged at the first port of discharge are " not given to the master, before loading has commenced, any " expense incurred by the shipowners at the first port of discharge " in shifting, discharging and/or reloading any cargo either for " the purpose of putting the vessel into seaworthy trim for the " passage to the second port or to enable the cargo for discharge " at the first port to be conveniently so discharged shall be paid " by the charterers, and the charterers shall indemnify the " shipowners against any claims by bill of lading holders in " respect of such shifting, discharging and/or reloading cargo. " In the event of the cargo being a homogeneous cargo (i.e. of the " same description quality and mark) the master shall discharge " the cargo in such manner as to leave the vessel in seaworthy " trim to proceed to the second port of discharge."

Clause 45: " Steamer shall be discharged at the average rate " of not less than 750 tons per weather working day (Sundays " and holidays excepted) provided vessel can deliver at such rate, " failing which demurrage to be paid to owners at the rate of " £200 per day or pro rata for part of a day. Time at discharging " port to count from notice of readiness, whether in berth or not."

Clause 48: " Overtime to be for account of the party ordering " it. If ordered by the port controller or his representative, " charterers to pay all extra expenses incurred."

Clause 49: " If two berths used at discharging port, cost of " shifting, including bunker fuel used to be for charterer's account " and time occupied in shifting to count."

Costs incurred at Cochin included amounts paid (a) for shifting charges payable and paid to the port authority, and stevedores' bill for trimming bulk wheat into the lower holds, covering it, and stacking the bagged wheat over it, amounting to £75 12s. 9d.; these were paid by the shipowner and subsequently refunded to her by the charterers but with no admission of liability to do so; and (b) crew's overtime totalling £9 13s. 6d., covering the work of officers and men in shifting the ship and looking after the stowage of the cargo.

It was admitted that Saturday was a weather working day. It was also admitted that the daily cost of the vessel and loss of earnings together exceeded £200, but the parties agreed that the demurrage rate of £200 per day (and pro rata) was a reasonable figure to take for the purpose of assessing any damages payable for the detention of the vessel.

The shipowner brought this action, claiming (i) the sum of £9 13s. 6d. in respect of crew's overtime under the seaworthy trim clause (clause 43) or a sum equal thereto as damages for breach of charter; and (ii) to be recouped by the charterers in respect of the delay to the ship between 4.30 p.m. on Saturday, November 27, and 1.30 p.m. on Sunday, November 28—21 hours—or other the lesser appropriate period as the court should think fit in the light of the facts set out in the agreed statement of facts. She claimed the appropriate sum in respect of such delay under clause 43, or as demurrage, or alternatively as damages for detention for breach of one or more express or implied terms of the charterparty; or in the further alternative, partly under clause 43, partly as demurrage, and partly as damages for detention.

On the claim for demurrage or damages for detention, the parties agreed that if the court should decide that the shipowner was entitled to recover on those claims, the rate for 21 hours should be £175, calculated on the demurrage rate. The defendants denied all liability.

Devlin J. on July 7, 1955, gave judgment for the shipowner for £184 13s. 6d., being the total of £175 for loss of ship's time and £9 13s. 6d. for crew's overtime. His Lordship, considering the words " any expense incurred " in their place in the charterparty, said that the words did not contemplate only money that had actually been paid out. He continued: " Having regard to " the object of the clause and what, as it seems plain to me, " the parties were striving to attain the balance they wanted " to attain between the charterer and the shipowner in this " matter—I think it would be quite unnecessarily restrictive to " construe the words as meaning only specific disbursements. " There can be no reason in principle why specific disbursements " should be distinguished from any other form of loss or expense " which the shipowner has to bear as a result of the late declara- " tion of two ports. The same principle could, in fairness, be " made to cover them both; indeed, it is manifest, as I should " have thought, that delay and the cost of delay to the shipowner " is bound to be by far the larger part of the result of what I call " the delayed declaration, and to exclude that from the compensa- " tion he receives under the clause would be to give him very far " from an equitable recompense if delay and all the cost of " running the ship and so forth are to be excluded. Accordingly, " I think a broader meaning should be given to the words and " that they should cover the cost of the delay and the expenses " which are set out in the agreed statement of facts. I think " they cover in a broad sense the expense to the shipowner of " having to do the work of shifting, discharging and reloading the " cargo."

His Lordship went on to consider the second sentence of the " Austral " clause on the position when the cargo was " homo- " geneous " and said that for the purposes of this clause one had to look at the commercial description and not at natural properties. Plainly it made a difference for the purposes of safe trim between ports of discharge whether the cargo was a cargo

UNION OF INDIA.

in bulk or whether it was described as cargo in bags. For all commercial purposes there was a difference in description between cargo in bulk and cargo in bags. Accordingly, he held that this was not a homogeneous cargo and, therefore, that the second sentence of the seaworthy trim clause did not apply to the circumstances of the present case.

His Lordship went on to say: "Two questions arise on that "sentence; the first question is what is meant by 'homogeneous' "and the second is what is the place of that sentence in the "clause as a whole? Are they providing for two separate con- "tingencies, the first sentence for one and the second sentence "for the other, or does the second sentence merely qualify the "first in some way? It is not very clearly worded—and by that "I do not mean that it is not very clearly worded from a lawyer's "point of view I mean I think it would be extraordinarily "difficult for anybody not familiar with the subject matter to "know just what the parties meant when they put in that "second sentence, or what the draftsman of the 'Austral' "charterparty meant. I think that, broadly speaking, the "object behind it is this: The parties are saying to themselves: "There is no need for any expense to be incurred or for any "delay, for if the cargo, for example, is all of the same mark, "then it will not matter whether the ship discharges at one port "or two ports, whether it discharges some of the cargo at one "port and some more at the second port; so far as stowage is "concerned it is all the same mark and it will not make any "difference even if the master had known what the position was. "So it says: In that event the ordinary rule shall apply, the "master shall discharge the vessel in such manner as to leave "the vessel in seaworthy trim to proceed to the second port of "discharge; and merely because the declaration of the option is "delayed he cannot come against the charterers under the first "sentence of the clause and say that he had to shift, discharge, "or reload the cargo at the first port of discharge. I think that "is the object which the parties had in mind; they intend that "to apply to what they described as "homogeneous cargo"— "that is to say, cargo of the same description, quality and mark. "I took the example of marks just now, but the example of "quality might equally well be taken, because different qualities "might be separately stowed."

Cur. adv. vult.

1956: Jan. 25. DENNING L.J. stated the facts and continued: The ship was thus delayed for 21 hours owing to the necessity of putting her into seaworthy trim. The question is who is to bear the expense of the work and the loss caused by the delay. The charterers have paid the charges of the port authorities for shifting the ship and the stevedores' bill for work on the cargo, but they have not paid the crew's overtime, which amounts to £9 13s. 6d., nor have they paid anything for the loss caused by the delay, which is put at £175. The shipowners claim that the charterers should pay these also. This depends on the true construction of the charterparty. This was in the "Centrocon" form, but it incorporated the "seaworthy trim clause" of the "Austral" charterparty, which is in these words: "Safe trim between ports "of discharge. If the option of ordering the vessel to discharge "at two ports is not exercised, or if correct particulars of the "cargo to be discharged at the first port of discharge are not "given to the master, before loading has commenced, any "expense incurred by the shipowners at the first port of discharge "in shifting, discharging and/or reloading any cargo either for "the purpose of putting the vessel into seaworthy trim for the "passage to the second port or to enable the cargo for discharge "at the first port to be conveniently so discharged shall be paid "by the charterers, and the charterers shall indemnify the ship-"owners against any claims by bill of lading holders in respect "of such shifting, discharging and/or reloading cargo. In the "event of the cargo being a homogeneous cargo (i.e., of the same "description quality and mark) the master shall discharge the "cargo in such manner as to leave the vessel in seaworthy trim "to proceed to the second port of discharge."

Under this clause it is plain that the shipowner can recover "any expense incurred in shifting the cargo." This obviously includes the stevedores' bill. It also includes, I think, the charges of the port authority for shifting the ship: and also the crew's overtime. This overtime was incurred in shifting the ship from the wharf to the stream and in looking after the stowage of the cargo. It was an expense which was necessarily incidental to the shifting of the cargo and, as such, is recoverable under the seaworthy trim clause. It is true that clause 49 says: "overtime to be for account of the party ordering it," but that is a general clause which must give place to the particular provisions of the seaworthy trim clause. The shipowners are entitled, in my opinion, to the £9 13s. 6d. claimed by them.

CHANDRIS v. UNION OF INDIA.

Denning L.J.

I do not think, however, that the shipowners can recover any compensation for the 21 hours' delay to the ship. My reason is simply that the word "expense" means money spent out of pocket and does not include loss of time. At any rate, that is clearly its meaning in this charterparty, because there are numerous clauses which draw a distinction between "expense" or "expenses" on the one hand, and "time occupied" on the other hand. In clause after clause you will find that, whenever the parties intend that time is to count as lay days, they say so expressly. I may refer, for example, to clause 9 of the print and clause 49 of the type. This leads me to think that "time" is not included in "expenses." If it is to count, the parties must say so: otherwise it is not recoverable.

It was suggested in the course of the argument that "expense" might include the cost of running the ship for the time occupied, and thus enable the shipowner to recover a proportion of wages, insurance, overheads and so forth. Mr. Roskill did not press this suggestion very much because of the practical difficulties in its application. He put his case plainly and distinctly on loss of time, for which he should be paid a sum equal to the demurrage rate. On this he is wrong, because it is not an "expense." In any case, the cost of running the ship is, I think, not recoverable because it is not expense incurred "in shifting, discharging or "reloading the cargo."

Mr. Roskill next contended that the time should count as lay days because it was time occupied in discharging the cargo, in that the discharge could not be said to be completed until the ship was made trim again ready to proceed on her voyage. The answer is, however, that the discharge was completed as soon as the last grain of the 2,900 tons was put off. The time occupied thereafter in trimming the ship is another matter altogether, and must be recovered under the "Austral" clause or not at all.

At one time in the agreed statement of facts it was suggested that the sum could be recovered as damages for breach of an implied term in the contract: but that was not pressed before us, for the simple reason that the matter is covered by express clauses in the charterparty and there is no room for any implication.

I must mention one further matter. Mr. Mocatta urged that this cargo was a "homogeneous" cargo and came within the second sentence of the "Austral" clause. I think not. It was a cargo partly in bulk and partly in bags and was therefore not homogeneous. It is true that this came about only because the master required a proportion of it to be bagged, but that makes no difference. If the charterers themselves had elected to load partly in bulk and partly in bags, it would clearly not be homogeneous. The important matter is the nature of the cargo when it comes to be discharged: and that is the same, no matter whether it results from the charterers' choice or the master's direction.

In the result, on the agreed statement of facts, I think the shipowners are entitled to recover the sum of £9 13s. 6d. and no more. The appeal should be allowed accordingly.

HODSON L.J. stated the facts and continued: The main question to be determined is whether the charterers are liable to pay for the 21 hours' time during which the vessel was delayed at Cochin. This depends on the construction of the words "any "expense incurred by the shipowners at the first port of discharge "in shifting . . . any cargo . . . for the purpose of putting the "vessel into seaworthy trim for the passage to the second port."

Devlin J. said: "There can be no reason in principle why "specific disbursements should be distinguished from any other "form of loss or expense which the shipowner has to bear as a "result of the late declaration of two ports. The same principle "could, in fairness, be made to cover them both; indeed, it is "manifest, as I should have thought, that delay and the cost "of delay to the shipowner is bound to be by far the larger part "of the result of what I call the delayed declaration, and to "exclude that from the compensation he receives under the "clause would be to give him very far from an equitable recom-"pense if delay and all the cost of running the ship and so forth "are to be excluded. Accordingly, I think a broader meaning "should be given to the words and that they should cover the "cost of the delay and the expenses which are set out in para-"graph 9 of the agreed statement of facts. I think they cover "in a broad sense the expense to the shipowner of having to do "the work of shifting, discharging and reloading the cargo."

In my judgment the judge has given to the words "any "expense" in this context too extended a meaning. The extract from the "Austral" charterparty covers the situation which has arisen, since the option of ordering the vessel to discharge at two ports was not exercised before loading had commenced and is designed to compensate the shipowner for the particular expense described. This is expense incurred at the first port of discharge in shifting cargo, not by reason of shifting it. I do not find these words apt to cover the whole expense of running the ship during the period in which she was delayed. Such expense is not, in my opinion, properly described either as incurred at the first port of discharge or in shifting the cargo. The qualifying words following the words "any expense" have, in my opinion, the effect of showing that the expense is limited to specific disburse-ments and not extended to matters which are involved in the delay of the ship and the consequent loss to the owners.

When time is in question, provision is to be found in the language of the charterparty. Several examples of this are to be found, such as in clauses 11, 13, 15, 45 and 49. Clause 9 is typical. It deals with loading berths, and reads: "Steamer to "shift at her own expense to a second safe shoot or berth, in any "rotation, at each loading port or place if required by charterers.

C. A.
CHANDRIS v. UNION OF INDIA.
Hodson L.J.

"If it is necessary for the steamer to get up steam to enable her "to shift to a second loading shoot or berth notice to be given "before loading at the first berth is completed otherwise time "lost to count as lay days." The expense of shifting and time are here dealt with separately, and clause 9 may, I think, be looked at as a parallel clause to the "Austral" clause under consideration for the purpose of construing the latter.

These clauses lead to the conclusion that if the parties had intended to cover loss of time in the "Austral" clause, they would have said so, for when time is to count it is made clear. Further, it is not, I think, irrelevant to remember that demurrage is, as I think Devlin J. has said in another case, an agreed quantity of damages for detention, and in this case it appears to have been taken as the basis of the award, for the expense caused by the 21 hours' delay has been equated to demurrage and thus has the figure of £175 been reached. This involves a simple calculation contemplated where time is counted as lay days.

I do not think, however, that the demurrage rate is necessarily the right measure of compensation for delay, for if the words "any expense" in their context are wide enough to cover cost of delay, the demurrage rate may well be too low. If the owner is right in her contention, the figure should be such as fully to compensate her for the delay incurred and would involve a detailed calculation of all the items which are included in the cost of running the ship. Such a calculation would be possible, and is made by the Admiralty Registrar in many cases where damages for detention are awarded; but I cannot think that the parties contemplated an elaborate inquiry in order to ascertain the cost to the owner of delay when using the words "any "expense" and defining this as that which is incurred at a specific port in shifting cargo. Moreover, most of the cost of running the ship was not incurred at Cochin and could not be ascertained until the end of the voyage. On the other hand, they must have had in mind specific disbursements incurred at the port in the operation of shifting cargo. Finally, apart from context, I think the primary meaning of the word "expense" is actual disbursements. Taking the words "any expense" in the context of the "Austral" extract and of the whole charterparty, I give the words their primary meaning.

I have confined what I have said to the first part of the incorporated extract from the "Austral" charterparty and have not referred to the last sentence, which deals with homogeneous cargoes, since I agree with Devlin J. and with his reasons for thinking that this cargo was not homogeneous in the sense of the definition provided in the same sentence. I need not, therefore, further consider the last sentence of the extract.

The second head under which the owner claims is demurrage. The discharge of cargo at Cochin ceased at 4.30 p.m. on Saturday, November 27, and the whole of the vessel's delay supervened.

The ship was then dealing with the restowing of the Bombay cargo. The claim, therefore, must fail under this head.

There was an alternative claim for damages for breach of charterparty based on an implied term in the charterparty to cover the cost of delay in the circumstances of this case, but this, it was rightly said by the charterers, would involve an embroidering of the charterparty without justification, and the claim was not pressed under this head. Any loss by delay not covered by the charterparty must lie where it falls.

There remains a sum of £9 13s. 6d. for crew's overtime after 4.30 p.m., being money expended in connexion with shifting the ship and looking after the stowage of the cargo. Clause 48 of the charterparty deals with overtime as follows: "Overtime to be "for account of the party ordering it. If ordered by the port "controller or his representative, charterers to pay all extra "expenses incurred." Since the owners cannot recover under this clause, they rely on the overriding effect of the typed clause taken from the "Austral" charterparty and say that this money represents expense incurred in shifting the cargo at the first port of discharge.

The charterers have not disputed certain sums for crew's overtime, but object to pay the sum in question for the following reasons: As to £3 19s. 6d., this was incurred, it is said, in shifting the ship and not in shifting the cargo. The answer to this objection is, I think, that in the circumstances of this case shifting the ship was part of the operation of shifting the cargo and therefore that the objection fails. As to the balance, it is said that looking after the stowage is not shifting cargo, but work of superintendence while the stevedores were working. I reject this objection also, as I think superintendence of the work is necessarily involved in its performance.

The "Austral" clause does, in my opinion, override clause 48 so as to cover these overtime payments and, accordingly, I would allow the claim for the £9 13s. 6d. Otherwise, I would dismiss the claim and allow the appeal to the necessary extent.

MORRIS L.J. The charterers had the option of discharging at two safe ports on the same coast of India. They did not, however, exercise that option before loading commenced. The result was that, under the seaworthy trim clause, they might be liable to pay certain expenses incurred by the shipowners. The question arises as to whether, in the events that happened, the charterers became so liable.

The vessel was required to discharge 2,900 tons of wheat at Cochin and that quantity (all in bulk) was discharged by 4.30 p.m. on Saturday, November 27. The vessel could not, however, immediately sail for Bombay, for the reason that the port authority lawfully required that the bagged cargo already on board should be restowed to their satisfaction before the vessel sailed. To comply with this requirement the vessel had to move from the

v.
UNION OF INDIA.

wharf at which discharge had already taken place to the stream. This move took two hours—that is, until 6.30 p.m. From 6.30 p.m. until 6.0 a.m. on Sunday, November 28, the time was occupied in trimming bulk wheat into the lower holds, covering it with tarpaulins and stacking bagged wheat over them. The satisfaction of the port authority, which was requisite, was expressed at noon. A pilot boarded the vessel an hour later, and the vessel sailed half an hour afterwards (that is, at 1.30 p.m.).

In the circumstances to which I have referred, I consider that the following words of the seaworthy trim clause became applicable: " . . . any expense incurred by the shipowners at the " first port of discharge in shifting . . . any cargo . . . for the " purpose of putting the vessel into seaworthy trim for the " passage to the second port . . . shall be paid by the charterers." It was submitted on behalf of the charterers that the first part of the seaworthy trim clause does not operate in the event of the cargo being what in the second sentence of the clause is called " a homogeneous cargo," and it was submitted that the cargo on the vessel was " a homogeneous cargo." Such a cargo is referred to in the sentence as being cargo " of the same description quality " and mark." I do not think that it is necessary to say that the second sentence is alternative to the first. But where a cargo is a homogeneous cargo and where the master performs the duty of discharging the cargo " in such manner as to leave the " vessel in seaworthy trim to proceed to the second port of " discharge," there would not, in ordinary circumstances, be any expense incurred by the shipowners which, within the words of the first part of the clause, would qualify for payment by the charterers. In the present case, however, I do not consider that the cargo was " a homogeneous cargo " as that phrase in its context and with its definition was used. I consider that, for present purposes, wheat in bulk should not be regarded as " of " the same description " as wheat in bags.

The words of the seaworthy trim clause recited above as being applicable involve that in this case there can be recovery (a) if there was expense incurred by the shipowners, (b) if such expense was incurred at Cochin, and (c) if such expense was incurred in shifting cargo for the purpose of putting the vessel into seaworthy trim for the passage from Cochin to Bombay.

One part of the claim presented by the shipowners was that they should be recouped by the charterers " in respect of the " delay to the vessel." That the vessel was delayed is, I think, beyond doubt and the delay was caused by the necessity of putting the vessel into seaworthy trim for the passage from Cochin to Bombay (subject only to the subsidiary question as to whether the delay from noon on the Sunday to 1.30 p.m. was unconnected with the work of putting the vessel into seaworthy trim). If there had not been the necessity of putting the vessel into seaworthy trim at Cochin, she would have sailed for Bombay at 4.30 p.m. on Saturday, November 27. As it was, the vessel was delayed because the trimming had to be done and the cost of running the vessel for 21 hours (or at least 19½ hours) was caused by the delay. The shipowners can only recover if they can bring themselves within the words of the contract which they made. The figure that has been awarded to the shipowners is £184 13s. 6d., of which £175 was on what was called "the delay account." That amount of £175 related to a period of 21 hours' delay and was calculated on the basis that a reasonable figure to take for the purpose of assessing any damages payable for the detention of the vessel would be £200 for 24 hours. Such a figure would include something for loss of profit. I find it difficult to see how, on any footing, a loss of profit related to time lost could be said to be an "expense" incurred at Cochin in shifting cargo.

Though it may well be that the shipowners incurred expense and also suffered a loss of profit as the result of delay, the sole question here is whether they proved that they incurred expense at Cochin in shifting cargo. The word "expense" conveys the idea of something spent or laid out or paid or disbursed or of some liability incurred. If it had been desired to compensate the shipowners on the basis of the value of time lost, that could have been provided for in the contract. The contract had of necessity to make provisions relating to time for purposes of loading and unloading and there were provisions as to when demurrage should be payable and as to the amount of it. Thus in clause 9 of the charterparty (which deals with loading berths) it is provided that "if it is necessary for the steamer to get up "steam to enable her to shift to a second loading shoot or berth "notice to be given before loading at the first berth is completed "otherwise time lost to count as lay days." Clause 11 deals with loading orders. If orders for the first loading port or place were not given as specified in the clause, then it was provided that "all time lost to the steamer through waiting for orders "shall be reckoned as loading time or, in the event of this charter "being cancelled, shall be paid for at the demurrage rate herein-"after mentioned." In the same clause it was provided that in a certain event "the time lost in putting up shifting boards (if "required) shall count as lay days . . . ." In other events it was provided by clause 15 that the time occupied in erecting shifting boards was not to count as lay days: and by that clause it was also provided that time occupied or time lost by reason of certain stated events should not count as lay days. Clause 13 provided for the rate of loading and for the amount of demurrage, if payable, and contained the necessary provisions as to when time for loading should commence to count. Other provisions in the charterparty related to unloading and to ports of discharge. Clause 26 contains a provision as to the time from which lay days are to count where there is insufficient water at a discharging port, and provides that in the defined circumstances "time occu-"pied in proceeding from the anchorage to the port of discharge "is not to count." Clause 45 provides for the average rate of

CHANDRIS v. UNION OF INDIA.
Morris L.J.

discharging and for the amount of demurrage, and defines when "time" is "to count." When at a loading port or place, the steamer had (see clause 9), if required by the charterers, to shift at her own expense to a second safe shoot or berth. If two berths were used at the discharging port, then by clause 49 it was provided as follows: "cost of shifting including bunker fuel used "to be for charterers' account and time occupied in shifting to "count."

A consideration of these various clauses lends confirmation to the view that the words "any expense incurred" are not apt words to bring about the result that there is to be recoupment in respect of delay on the basis of what sum would be awarded if the ship were delayed or detained. If the parties had wished to provide that, in the stipulated circumstances, any time occupied at the first port of discharge in shifting cargo for the purpose of putting the vessel into seaworthy trim for passage to the second port should count as part of the lay days, it would have been easy for them so to provide and to use language comparable to that used where in various events they were agreeing that time should for certain purposes count.

For these reasons, I consider that the claim in its widest form was not established. But this still leaves the question as to whether expense was incurred at Cochin in shifting cargo. The facts are not in dispute. Instead of proceeding on her voyage to Bombay at 4.30 p.m. on Saturday, November 27, the vessel had to move from the wharf to a position in the stream. Why? Because some shifting of the cargo, to put the vessel into seaworthy trim, was necessary. The expense of moving the vessel seems clearly to be an expense within clause 43. I do not think that the words "any expense incurred . . . in shifting" in clause 43 can be limited to the expense incurred in the actual touching or handling of the cargo. This matter can be tested by considering what would have been the position if, instead of merely having to shift the cargo, the vessel had had to discharge cargo on to a quay or into a warehouse. It could hardly be said that the clause covered merely the handling of the cargo and did not extend to cover any warehouse charges or port charges or dues which might be involved. The expense referred to in the seaworthy trim clause must, I think, include any expense necessarily incurred and solely incurred in order to effect the required shifting or discharging or reloading of the cargo. In the present case I cannot think that the charterers could have avoided refunding to the shipowners the amounts which the latter had to pay to the port authority by way of shifting charges in respect of the ship. The charterers did in fact refund these amounts, but with no admission of liability so to do. In the move, bunker fuel may have been used. If so, the expense of this was, I think, clearly an expense that became necessary because cargo had to be shifted. It was only incurred because the cargo had to be shifted and in order that the cargo could be shifted. It was, I think, an expense incurred in shifting the cargo.

The position may be compared with that which is covered by clause 9, to which I have referred. Under that clause, the charterers may require the vessel to shift to a second safe shoot or berth at each loading port or place and then ordinarily the vessel is "to shift at her own expense." In the present case, if the movement of the vessel was occasioned by the necessity of shifting the cargo, as I think it was, then the expense of moving the vessel has to be paid by the charterers. By a parity of reasoning, it seems to me that the expense of maintaining the vessel, not during the voyage or during loading or unloading times, but in the place where shifting of cargo for trimming purposes had to be done and for such time only as the process of trimming involved, was an expense incurred at that place in shifting cargo for the purpose of putting the vessel into trim.

After the vessel was moored in the stream, work was done by stevedores in trimming bulk wheat into the lower holds, covering it with tarpaulins and stacking bagged wheat over the tarpaulins. The sums payable to the stevedores constituted an expense incurred in shifting the cargo. But the stevedores could not have done this work unless the vessel remained at Cochin and, indeed, the vessel was not allowed to leave and was obliged to stay until the shifting had taken place. It seems to me, therefore, that the cost of running and maintaining the vessel at Cochin was an expense incurred in shifting the cargo. Had the necessity to shift the cargo not arisen, the vessel would not have been at Cochin at all after 4.30 p.m. on November 27. She would have been sailing on so as to complete her voyage, so as thereafter to be free to earn freight on a further voyage.

The necessity of shifting the cargo involved that some overtime had to be worked by the crew. An amount of £14 9s. 3d. in respect of such overtime is admitted by the charterers to be payable by them. This means that it is admitted that the overtime payments due from the shipowners to their crew constituted an expense incurred in shifting the cargo. Equally I think that the expense of maintaining the vessel for some time in a place where she otherwise would not be, and maintaining her there solely for the purpose of shifting the cargo, was an expense in shifting the cargo. Overtime also became payable to certain officers and men of the crew who had to look after the stowage of the cargo. The amount of such overtime was, I think, clearly an expense in shifting the cargo. It is true that by clause 48 it is provided that "overtime is to be for account of the party "ordering it." But that is a general provision and it is overridden by the special provision of clause 43 if particular facts bring the seaworthy trim clause, which is a part of clause 43, into operation. The overtime payments to certain officers and men only arose because of the necessity of, and in the process of, shifting the cargo to put the vessel into approved seaworthy trim: so the expense solely caused by having to wait while cargo was shifted and until trim was approved was an expense incurred at Cochin. If expense was there incurred, in the sense that liability to pay was there incurred or in the sense that things that cost money were there consumed (such as fuel for the ship or food for the crew) or in the sense that services which have to be paid for were there prolonged, then it is immaterial that actual payment may have been made elsewhere.

It was submitted on behalf of the charterers that, though the words of the seaworthy trim clause are borrowed from the "Austral" charter, they are firmly incorporated into the charter now under consideration, the whole of which can therefore be looked at where construction of words or phrases is necessary. I think that this is correct and it is, I think, a legitimate argument that where "time is to count" this is in terms agreed. In the events that have happened, it could not be said that time was to count as discharging time. The applicable words must be given only their reasonable meaning. The charterparty employs in some clauses the phrase "extra expenses." Clause 6 provides that in some circumstances "all extra expenses" in loading and discharging cargo other than grain are to be paid by the charterers. Clause 14 provides: "The steamer to work "at night if required by the charterers, they paying all extra expenses for such work." Clause 48 provides that if overtime is ordered by the port controller, then the charterers are to pay "all extra expenses" incurred. Overtime involves an "extra" expense because payments in respect of labour services for ordinary hours would merely be an expense. The phrase "extra "expenses" denotes expenses additional to expenses which would otherwise be incurred. The phrase "any expense "incurred" must have a wider import.

The conclusion that I have reached is that the phrase "any "expense incurred" did not cover loss of profit or loss of earnings and that the amount to which, in the events which happened, the shipowners became entitled could not be measured on the basis of the demurrage rate or by reference to a figure that would be reasonable to take for the purpose of assessing damages payable for the detention of the vessel. In my judgment, the shipowners are entitled to receive a sum which represents the expense they incurred at Cochin in shifting the cargo. On the agreed facts, which are special to this case, there was expense incurred of the nature to which I have referred. The material is not before the court to enable it to determine the exact sum. Unless it were agreed, there would have to be further inquiry. Any inquiry will involve investigating the facts and figures of this particular case. If any expense incurred in the period after midday on the Sunday (when the port authority expressed satisfaction with the trimming) was avoidably incurred, then it would not be allowed: but, in the absence of proof to the contrary, it would be reasonable to assume that the vessel sailed as soon as was practicable after permission to leave was forthcoming. In my judgment, the facts of the case show that the agreement would have operated somewhat hardly upon the shipowners had there not been an inclusion of words entitling them to be recouped for expense incurred.

An alternative method of claim, expressed as being one for damages for detention and alleging breaches of implied terms of the charterparty, was abandoned. A further alternative method of claim was argued, in that it was submitted that the activities between 4.30 p.m. on Saturday, November 27, and midnight should be regarded as being part of the process of discharging, with the result that the $7\frac{1}{2}$ hours should count as time used as part of the lay days. The submission did not extend to the time after midnight because of the provision in clause 45 that Sundays were to be excepted from inclusion as weather working days for discharging. I cannot accede to the submission made. It seems to me that discharging ended at 4.30 p.m. and that the later activities were of the nature for which special provision was made by the terms of clause 43.

In the result, while I am to a substantial extent in agreement with the conclusions of the judge, I consider that the sum to which the plaintiff is entitled should not include any allowance for loss of profit, but should be specifically computed so as to represent the actual expense incurred at Cochin in shifting the cargo. I have in my judgment indicated which are the kinds of items of expense which, in my judgment, should be computed.

In the result I would have allowed the appeal to the extent that, instead of receiving the sum awarded, the plaintiff should receive a sum to be calculated (either in a further hearing or in an inquiry or reference) on the basis which I have set out.

Appeal allowed in part.

with his permission provided that such a person held a licence to drive such a motor-car or had held and was not disqualified for holding or obtaining such a licence. The son of the policy holder, aged 15, who had obtained a licence to drive by making a false statement to the licensing authority as to his age, drove a motor-car with the permission of the policy holder.

Held, that as between the insured and the insurers, the restriction in the policy extended to persons disqualified under sections 7 (4) [1] and 9 (5) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930; and that, by reason of the son being under age for holding a licence, both the son and the father were accordingly guilty of an offence against 35 (1) of the Act.

CASE STATED by Essex justices sitting at Chelmsford.

Informations were preferred under section 35 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, against the first defendant William Charles Hardy, alleging that on April 23 and June 1, 1955, he used a motor-car when there was not in force such a policy of insurance, or such a security, in respect of third party risks as complied with the requirements of the Act. An information was also preferred under section 35 against the second defendant, William Cullum Hardy, that on June 1, 1955, he permitted the user of a motor-car by the first defendant, while no such policy or security as is required by the Act was in force.

The following facts were found by the justices. At all material times the second defendant was the owner of a motor-car, index number UX 6292, and was insured by the General Accident Fire and Life Assurance Corporation. The conditions of user of the motor-car in the policy of insurance provided that it could be driven by any person on the second defendant's order or permission provided that such a person held a licence to drive such a motor-car or had held and was not disqualified from holding such a licence. The first defendant was born on June 7, 1939, and was at the time of the alleged offences aged 15. On April 13, 1955, Essex County Council had issued a provisional driving licence, for such vehicles as included the motor-car in question, to the first defendant on his falsely stating that he was born on January 22, 1938. On April 23, and June 1, 1955, the [1] Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 35: "(1) . . . it shall not be lawful for "any person to use . . . or permit any "other person to use, a motor vehicle "on a road unless there is in force in "relation to the user of the vehicle by "that person . . . such a policy of "insurance or such a security in "respect of third-party risks as com-"plies with the requirements . . . of "this Act".

S. 7 (4): "If any person who under "the provisions of this Part of this "Act is disqualified for holding or "obtaining a licence applies for or "obtains a licence while he is so dis-"qualified . . . that person shall be "liable on summary conviction to "imprisonment . . . and a licence "obtained by any person disqualified "as aforesaid shall be of no effect."

S. 9 (5): "A person prohibited by "this section by reason of his age "from driving a motor vehicle or a "motor vehicle of any class, shall, "for the purposes of this Part of this "Act, be deemed to be disqualified "under the provisions of this Part of "this Act for holding or obtaining "any licence. . . ."

first defendant drove the motor-car in question on the highway, being accompanied on the latter occasion by the second defendant, who was seated in the passenger seat beside him. The insurance corporation considered themselves as liable and at risk under the policy in respect of the driving of the first defendant.

On behalf of the prosecutors it was contended that the effect of sections 9 (5) and 7 (4) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, was that the licence issued to the first defendant was of no effect and accordingly that the insurance policy did not cover the user of the motor-car by the first defendant.

The justices were of the opinion that the first defendant on April 23, and June 1, 1955, held a licence within the meaning of the policy although he was under age and had made a false statement as to his age; and that, accordingly, he was insured in respect of third party risks as required by section 35 of the Act. They dismissed the informations.

The prosecutor appealed.

W. M. Howard for the prosecutor.

The defendants did not appear and were not represented.

The only case cited in argument appears in the judgment.

LORD GODDARD C.J. This is a case stated by justices for the petty sessional division of Chelmsford, before whom the first defendant was charged with two offences of using a motor-vehicle on the road when there was no policy of insurance in force; and the second defendant, his father, was charged with permitting the use on one occasion.

This case raises a point of some importance. The first defendant was under age for obtaining a licence, though in fact he did obtain one by false pretences.

The Road Traffic Act, 1930, provides that a person under the appropriate age is disqualified from obtaining a licence, and the term "disqualified" is used. Section 7 (4) provides: "If any "person who under the provisions of this part of this Act is "disqualified for holding or obtaining a licence applies for or "obtains a licence while he is so disqualified", then the licence shall be of no effect: in other words, it shall be void.

At the hearing of the information a representative of the insurance company, the General Accident Fire and Life Assurance Corporation Ltd., told the justices that by reason of the decision of the court in Edwards v. Griffiths,[1] the corporation would have considered themselves liable if an accident had happened in this case. I inquired, therefore, when this case was opened, if the police authorities had communicated with the Insurance Bureau to find out whether this was a case in which liability would have been assumed, and the reason for my inquiry is shown in the first paragraph of my judgment in Edwards v. Griffiths,[1] that is, whether an arrangement had been made as approved by the Home Office. Mr. Howard has told us that the reason why this case is brought up is because it is desirable to have a ruling on how far the decision in Edwards v. Griffiths [1] goes. It is one thing for an insurance company to say: "We "would not insist upon the clause in our policy that the driver "must be a licensed driver if it is a mere matter of his having "forgotten to take out a licence". It is quite another thing if he is disqualified by an order of the court from driving, and at the time when this case came before the justices the driver had not been disqualified by an order of the court. In Edwards v. Griffiths,[1] this court decided that a provision in a policy providing that a driver must hold a licence, or that he must have held one and must not be disqualified from holding or obtaining a licence, meant disqualified by an order of the court. We were there not considering the case which we have before us today, that of a person being under age. We were considering a case where a man had been refused a licence on the grounds of health; he was not disqualified, but simply refused a licence on the grounds of health. We held that that made all the difference.

MUMFORD v. HARDY.

Mr. Howard has called our attention in this case to the fact that section 9 (5) of the Act provides: "A person prohibited "by this section"—and a person under 17 years of age is prohibited—"by reason of his age from driving a motor-vehicle "or a motor-vehicle of any class, shall, for the purposes of this "part of this Act, be deemed to be disqualified under the pro- "visions of this Part of this Act for holding or obtaining any "licence . . . "; and section 7 provides that if a licence is obtained by a person who is disqualified—as this young man was—the licence is void. Therefore, I think that quite different considerations apply to this case than applied in Edwards v. Griffiths,[1] and although the manager of the insurance company said that they would have considered themselves on risk, it is evident that they took that view because they thought that Edwards v. Griffiths [1] applied to this case, whereas it does not. Therefore, in my opinion, the case must go back to the justices with a direction that an offence was proved in all three cases.

Road Traffic — Licence — Goods vehicle — Estate car — Excise duty — Photographer using car for carriage of photographic equipment — "Goods" — Vehicles (Excise) Act, 1949 (12, 13 & 14 Geo. 6, c. 89), ss. 13 (1), 27 (1) — Finance Act, 1952 (15 & 16 Geo. 6 & 1 Eliz. 2, c. 33), s. 7 (2).

The defendant, the director of a firm of photographic printers and free lance photographers, used a motor vehicle, a Standard Vanguard shooting brake, to convey certain photographic equipment in connexion with his business. Excise duty had not been paid at the appropriate rate for a goods vehicle as required by section 13 (1) of the Vehicles (Excise) Act, 1949[1]:—

Held, that the vehicle was a goods vehicle within section 27 (1) of the Act of 1949; that on the facts it was being used for the carriage of goods in connexion with the defendants' trade or business; accordingly, it did not come within the exception provided by section 7 (2) of the Finance Act, 1952,[2] and, therefore, the defendant was guilty of an offence under section 13 (1) of the Act of 1949.

Quaere whether, if a doctor carried his instruments or a lawyer his legal books or robes in such a vehicle, he would be liable to pay duty appropriate to a goods vehicle.

Per curiam. If a person has one of these vehicles and carries in it nothing except his own luggage or his farm produce for his own use, and nothing which has to do with his trade or business, he commits no offence if he licenses it at the private car rate.

CASE STATED by Manchester justices.

On July 6 and 24, 1955, informations were preferred by the prosecutor against the defendant, William George Thompson, that on or about March 23, 1955, at Old Trafford, in the County of Lancaster, he did unlawfully use on a road, called Chester Road, a motor vehicle (1) for the carriage of goods, the defendant at the time not being in possession of a licence to carry goods, contrary to section 1 of the Road Traffic Act, 1933; (2) when there was not in force in relation to the user of the vehicle the requisite policy of insurance or security in respect of third party risks, contrary to section 35 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930; (3) while there was in force in respect of the vehicle a certain licence at a certain rate of duty under the Vehicles (Excise) Act, 1949, when the vehicle was being used for a purpose for which a higher rate of duty was chargeable, such higher rate not having been paid, contrary to section 13 (1) of that Act.

On August 16, and 25, 1955, the justices heard the informations and found the following facts: The defendant was at all material times the owner of a Standard Vanguard shooting brake, registered number EDB 116, correctly described by the defendant in his evidence before the justices, as an estate car delivery van. In relation to the use of this vehicle for the carriage of goods, double doors were fitted at the rear, and the seats in the rear were capable of being folded forward. At the time and place referred to in the informations the defendant was using the vehicle on a road for the conveyance of two press cameras, a tripod, a box of flashlight bulbs, and a box containing miscellaneous photographic equipment for or in connection with the business of photographic printers and free lance photographers of which the defendant was a director. At no material time had duty been paid in respect of the vehicle at the rate appropriate to a goods vehicle of its weight, nor was there in force in respect of the vehicle any licence for the carriage of goods granted under Part I of the Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933. Further, there was no policy of insurance affording cover against third party risks in respect of the user of the vehicle for the carriage of goods in connexion with trade or business, though there was such a policy covering its user for social, domestic, or pleasure purposes.

It was contended by the prosecutor that the cameras, bulbs, and other photographic equipment constituted goods, and that the vehicle was constructed for use for the carriage of goods. On behalf of the defendant it was contended that there was no evidence that the vehicle was constructed for carrying goods, and that no part of the vehicle had been adapted, altered or removed for any purpose. It was, therefore, contended that the vehicle was not a "goods vehicle" within the meaning of section 1 of the Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933, or the Fourth Schedule to the Vehicles (Excise) Act, 1949, or section 27 (1) of the Act.

The justices were of opinion that the vehicle was neither essentially constructed nor adapted for use for the carriage of goods. The justices came to the conclusion that if the test was the nature of the "goods" irrespective of the type of vehicle, then the carriage of a doctor's professional instruments or a lawyer's textbooks in a private car might result in the commission of these offences. They could not accept this view. Accordingly they dismissed the summonses.

The prosecutor appealed.

Rodger Winn for the prosecutor.

The defendant was not represented and did not appear.

The following cases were referred to in argument: Clarke v. Cherry [1]; Hubbard v. Messenger.[2]

LORD GODDARD C.J. stated the facts, and continued: This case has been put forward to us as a test case for the guidance of justices and their clerks. It is not suggested that there was a wilful (in the sense of a deliberate) intention of evading the payment of any duty, but it is desirable that uniform decisions should be given in different parts of the country in relation to vehicles of the type under consideration. Everyone knows that at the present time these shooting brakes, or dual purpose vans, as they are sometimes called, are in very common use. We have to decide, in the first place, whether or not these shooting brakes are capable of being regarded as goods vehicles. By section 27 (1) of the Vehicles (Excise) Act, 1949, a "goods vehicle" is defined as a "mechanically propelled vehicle . . . constructed or adapted "for use and used for the conveyance of goods or burden of any "description, whether in the course of trade or otherwise." All that we have to find, is, not whether this vehicle was constructed solely, but whether it was constructed or adapted for use for the conveyance of goods and that it was used for the conveyance of goods. It is impossible to argue and, indeed, it has not been argued, that these shooting brakes, are not constructed or adapted for use for the conveyance of goods.

Section 13 (1) of the Vehicles (Excise) Act, 1949, provides: "... where a licence has been taken out in respect of a mechani- "cally propelled vehicle at any rate under this Act and the vehicle "is at any time while the licence is in force used in an altered "condition or in a manner or for a purpose which brings it within, "or which if it was used solely in that condition or in that "manner or for that purpose would bring it within, a class or "description of vehicle to which a higher rate of duty is applic- "able under this Act, duty at that higher rate shall become "chargeable in respect of the licence for the vehicle."

Thus, if a person obtains a licence for one of these shooting brakes, and pays the duty required for a private vehicle, and then uses it for a purpose which brings it within the description of a goods vehicle, he must pay duty at the requisite rate, otherwise he commits an offence under that section.

TAYLOR v. THOMPSON.

Lord Goddard C.J.

The hardship which was caused by that provision was mitigated by the Finance Act, 1952, which provides in section 7 (2): "From the beginning of the year 1953 a vehicle which is constructed or adapted for use for the conveyance of goods or burden, but is not used for the conveyance thereof for hire or reward or for or in connection with a trade or business . . . shall not be treated for the purposes of the Vehicles (Excise) Act, 1949, as a goods vehicle."

Therefore, the position is quite clear. These estate vans are constructed in such a manner that they can be goods vehicles. This being so, they attract a higher rate of duty if they are used for the conveyance of goods either for hire or reward, or in connexion with a trade or business. If a person has one of these vans, and he carries in it nothing except his own luggage, or his own farm produce for his own use, and nothing which has to do with his trade or business, he is committing no offence if he licenses it, and keeps it licensed, at what one may call the private car rate; but if he does carry goods, that is to say, as it seems to me, anything in connexion with his trade or business, at once it becomes a goods vehicle and it has to bear the higher rate.

The justices said that if this was the position, it would mean that if a doctor has one of these cars, and he drives about the country carrying with him his bag of instruments, that would make him liable. It is not necessary for us to say whether or not a doctor would be liable. We should have to consider whether or not he was carrying on a trade or business within the meaning of this section, and the same thing would apply in the case of a lawyer's books and professional robes. We need not decide that for the purposes of the present case.

What we are deciding, in this case, is that a press photographer, who is a director of a business which deals with photographic matters, and who carries in one of these vans his photographic apparatus, does come within section 13 (1) of the Act of 1949, and he cannot bring himself within the exemption which has been granted by the Finance Act, 1952, because to do so he must show that he was carrying goods which have no connexion with his trade or business.

For these reasons we think that the justices' decision cannot be supported. We are only asked to send back one of the summonses, that is to say, the one in respect of the Vehicles (Excise) Act, 1949. That must go back with a direction that an offence was proved. Mr. Winn does not ask us to send back the other summonses which are consequential summonses. In relation to the summons with regard to the policy of insurance, one is quite sure that no reputable insurance company would take the point. Therefore, there is no necessity to send that back. We will send back the one summons, and say that there must be a conviction under the Vehicles (Excise) Act, 1949, the justices being at liberty under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts to mitigate the penalty if they think fit.

Factory — Dangerous machinery — Fencing — Material or article in machine — Wire-drawing machinery — End of wire causing fatal injury to workman—No statutory duty to fence material in machine unless expressly provided for—Whether wire performing pulling function "dangerous part of machine" — Factories Act, 1937 (1 Edw. 8 & 1 Geo. 6, c. 67), s. 14 (1) (3).

A workman in a factory was killed by being struck on the head by the end of a length of wire which was being reduced in diameter by being pulled through a die under pressure and wound round a revolving drum. The drum had a guard to prevent the wire from flapping out at the side. In an action by the widow for damages for negligence and breach of statutory duty to fence every dangerous part of any machinery under section 14 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, the trial judge found that the end of the wire had in some way ridden up over the top of the guard and had struck the workman on the head. He held that there was no negligence at common law, but that there had been a breach of the statutory duty to fence since the receiving drum plus the wire constituted a dangerous part of machinery. On appeal by the employers:

Held, that the wire was material in the machine and not part of the machinery within section 14 (1), and inasmuch as it was not within subsection (3) of that section (requiring that a stock-bar in a lathe should be fenced) and no regulations had been made in respect of such material the employers were not liable.

APPEAL from Stable J.

On July 23, 1952, Solomon Bullock was employed during the night shift on a wire drawing machine on the premises of the defendants, G. John Power (Agencies) Ltd., the premises being a factory within the Factories Acts, 1937 to 1948. The work involved drawing a long piece of wire over half an inch thick through a hole half an inch in diameter under electrically driven force in order to reduce it by pressure; and the pulling end of the wire was on a drum which revolved at between 24 and 50 revolutions a minute coiling the wire round itself. When the wire reached the end of the coil the end of the wire flapped loose and swung outwards from the drum. There was a guard or fence around the drum so that the end of the wire should not flap out at the side.

On the night in question, a workman working on a similar machine a few yards from Bullock heard the banging of the wire against the guard, looked round, and found Bullock on the ground in a pool of blood. He was taken to hospital and died shortly after without regaining consciousness. The police who were called examined the wire and the machine and found a piece of human hair on the end of the wire, and the medical report stated that the injuries suffered by the dead workman were consistent with his having been struck on the head by the end of a coil of wire.

The plaintiff, Margaretta Bullock, as widow and administratrix of his estate, brought an action for damages against the defendants under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846 to 1908, and the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, alleging that the accident which had caused the death of her husband was caused by breach of the defendants' statutory duty under section 14 of the Factories Act, 1937,[1] to fence the machine securely or at all; and, alternatively for negligence at common law. The defendants denied liability under both heads and pleaded alternatively that the dead workman had been contributorily negligent in placing his head too close to the block when the end of the wire coil was passing through the die, in breach of express instructions given to him by the employers or their servants.

On October 18, 1955, Stable J. dismissed the claim at common law alleging negligence. On the alleged breach of statutory duty under section 14, the defendants submitted that the parts of the machine, whether dangerous or not, had not caused the injury; that if the end of the wire had caused the injury that was not a part of the machine which had to be fenced; and that, apart from the provision in section 14 (3) in relation to a stock-bar projecting beyond the head-stock of a lathe, there was no duty under the statute to fence the material. Stable J. held that the proper approach to the question was: "Was this a dangerous part of the machine, or was there a "dangerous part of this particular machine?" and the answer was that this occurrence showed that the revolving drum was a dangerous part of the machine. As to whether it was securely fenced, his Lordship found that the workman met his death by his head coming into contact with the end of the wire while the drum was revolving, that the drum plus the wire was a dangerous part of the machine, and that the fence provided was inadequate to protect the workman from that danger. He awarded the plaintiff damages of £3,931 11s., being £3,800 under the Fatal Accidents Acts and £131 11s. under the Act of 1934.

[1] Factories Act, 1937, s. 14: "(1) "Every dangerous part of any "machinery, other than prime "movers and transmission machi- "nery, shall be securely fenced "unless it is in such a position or of "such construction as to be as safe "to every person employed or work- "ing on the premises as it would be "if securely fenced: Provided that, "in so far as the safety of a dan- "gerous part of any machinery can- "not by reason of the nature of the "operation be secured by means of "a fixed guard, the requirements of "this subsection shall be deemed to "have been complied with if a device "is provided which automatically "prevents the operator from coming "into contact with that part. . . . "(3) Any part of a stock-bar which "projects beyond the head-stock of "a lathe shall be securely fenced "unless it is in such a position as to "be as safe to every person employed "or working on the premises as it "would be if securely fenced. The "Secretary of State may, as respects "any machine or any process in "which a machine is used, make "regulations requiring the fencing of "materials or articles which are dan- "gerous while in motion in the "machine."

The defendants appealed.

John Thompson Q.C. and E. G. H. Beresford for the defendants.

R. F. Levy Q.C. and George Heron for the plaintiff.

The following cases were referred to in the argument: Hindle v. Birtwhistle [2]; Nicholls v. F. Austin (Leyton) Ltd. [3]; Dickson v. Flack [4]; Burns v. Joseph Terry & Sons Ltd. [5]; John Summers & Sons Ltd. v. Frost. [6]

DENNING L.J. stated the facts, and continued: The inference which the judge drew (which must be accepted) was that one end of the wire, the loose end, had in some way ridden up over the guard and had struck Bullock on the head and killed him.

The claim at common law for negligence against the employers failed because the judge was satisfied that no one could have anticipated any accident from this machine and the wire as it then was. No such accident had been heard of before. The machine has been operated in just the same way ever since and no other accident has been known; and, indeed, the witnesses could not explain how this happened. The judge acquitted the employers of negligence and there is no appeal from that finding. The question in the case is on the Factories Act, 1937. It is said that this was a "dangerous part of machinery" and ought to have been securely fenced within section 14 (1) of the Act.

The House of Lords, in Nicholls v. F. Austin (Leyton) Ltd.,[1] pointed out that the section itself draws a distinction between parts of machinery, on the one hand, and materials or articles which are in motion in it on the other hand. In that case, where a splinter of wood came out of a woodworking machine which was securely fenced, it was held that the wood which was being worked was not a dangerous part. In the present case the judge has held that this revolving drum, plus the wire, was a dangerous part of machinery. On reading through the speeches in Nicholls' case [1] I find myself unable to agree with the judge. Lord Uthwatt pointed out [2] that it is not right to view the machine as a single operating unit. You have to look at the machinery by itself and the materials by themselves. That is borne out by subsection (3), which takes the instance of a lathe. The legislature have provided expressly that the piece of wood (or whatever material is in a lathe)—the piece which projects beyond the head-stock—must be securely fenced, thus indicating very forcibly that material which is in motion in the machine does not come within the section unless it is either brought expressly within it, as it is in subsection (3) in the case of a stock-bar, or regulations have been made by the Secretary of State to deal with it; and the Secretary of State has, I gather, made no such regulations.

Mr. Thompson, for the defendants, argued that the wire was material in motion in the machine, and therefore did not come within the obligations of the Act. Mr. Levy, in order to overcome that argument, sought to divide the wire into two parts: the pulling part which was pulling the wire through the hole which, he said, was temporarily part of the machinery—and the part on the other side which was being pulled into the hole—which he said was the material which was being worked upon. I am afraid that that is much too fine a distinction for the court to adopt. The truth is that the whole piece of wire was being worked upon in this machine. It had to be reduced by 1/32nd of an inch. It was material in the machine and not part of the machinery. The Act does not require material to be fenced. It is left to the common law.

If that be right, no further question arises. I would only say, though, that if this wire could be considered as part of the machine, I myself should have regarded it as a dangerous part. But we are bound by the House of Lords' decision to hold that it is not part of the machine. The only obligation is at common law; and, the plaintiff not having proved negligence at common law, the action must fail and she must be left her remedies under the industrial insurance provisions. I think that the appeal should be allowed.

MORRIS L.J. I have reached the same conclusion. The principal point that is involved in the case is one of construction of section 14 of the Act of 1937 and of the application of that section to the facts of this case as they have been found by the judge. I think that Mr. Thompson is right when he says that it is helpful to look at section 14 as a whole, including the last paragraph of it, whether that paragraph be thought to be a part of subsection (3) or not. It seems to me that the decision in Nicholls v. F. Austin (Leyton) Ltd.[3] binds us in the present case. It is true that the facts were somewhat different, for the reason that what happened in Nicholls' case[3] was that when a circular saw was being used there was injury because a piece of wood flew out from the machine. In the course of his speech in that case Lord Simonds quoted the way in which one of the questions then arising had been posed, and said[4]: "The first "question is, I think, correctly stated in the appellant's case in "these words: 'Whether the words "every dangerous part" "'referred to in section 14 of the Factories Act, 1937, refer "'only to parts which are directly dangerous by reason that the "'part itself is liable to cause injury so that such parts only are "'required to be fenced by the said section, or whether the said "'words "every dangerous part" include parts which are "'indirectly dangerous in that they are liable to throw out "'material with such force that the material is liable to cause "'injury to the worker so that such parts also are required to "'be fenced by the said section.'"

Lord Simonds answered that question in these words[4]: "My "Lords, I have no doubt that this question should be answered "by saying that the words 'every dangerous part' in their "context refer only to parts which are directly dangerous by "reason that the part itself is liable to cause injury."

Later his Lordship made specific reference to the concluding words of section 14. He said[5]: "Finally, the concluding words "of section 14, which might well be in a separate section, "confirm this view. For the Secretary of State is thereby "authorized 'as respects any machine or any process in which "'a machine is used' to make regulations requiring the fencing "'of materials or articles which are dangerous while in motion "'in the machine.'" He proceeds: "Here a clear distinction "is drawn between dangerous parts of the machine and materials "or articles. The authority would be superfluous if the danger "apprehended by subsection (1) included danger not only from "contact with a dangerous part but also from the materials "which it might discharge."

Mr. Levy has sought to distinguish that case from the present by submitting that here there was not the discharge of a part of something that was passing through a machine; he submits that the wire itself became part of the machinery. Mr. Levy submitted that it was necessary to have force in order that the wire should be drawn through that part of the die where the reducing process took place; that it was necessary, therefore, to have some traction of the wire; and he submitted that the wire that had passed through the die and was on the drum formed a part of the machine in that it was necessary that that wire should draw the wire that still remained to pass through the die. But it is difficult to know quite where that submission would stop, because wire near to the die but which has not passed through the die could be said to be performing the function of drawing the wire which is still further away from the die.

It seems to me, however, that the suggested distinction is unreal and artificial; it seems to me that the reasoning in Nicholls' case [6] cannot be distinguished, that reasoning being based on the construction of the words found in section 14. I think that the appeal succeeds. I agree with what my Lord has said as to the other part of the case and I do not find it necessary to add anything in regard to that.

PARKER L.J. I agree. I think that the reasoning of their Lordships in Nicholls v. F. Austin (Leyton) Ltd. [6] negatives any liability on the part of the defendants in the present case, unless the true view be that the wire in question—that is, the wire that caused the injury and the death—was itself part of the machine. Mr. Levy in his very able argument put the matter in two ways. He said, firstly, that this wire was firmly attached to the machine and, secondly, that not only was it attached but that when attached it performed part of the function of the machine itself.

Dealing with those two submissions, it seems to me that the mere fact that material is firmly attached to a machine cannot make it part of the machine. Indeed, if that were so, the provision in section 14 (3) in regard to the stock-bar would be quite unnecessary. So far as the second proposition is concerned, Mr. Levy puts the matter in this way, that so soon as any part of the length of wire has come through the die it performs the function of haulage, a function of the machine itself. I feel quite unable to divide up the wire in that way as partly raw material and partly as performing the function of the machine. It seems to me that the true view is that this machine is dealing with a length of wire, 50 feet, or whatever it may be; that the drum itself (which undoubtedly is part of the machine) is pulling that article, that 50-feet length of wire, through the die, and at the same time winding it into a coil, in which form it will be removed from the machine and stored. Reluctantly I feel that this appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Negligence—Safe system of work—General practice—Ship—Open hold —Guardrails not erected—Injury to seaman.

In a grain ship at sea, after each hold had been made ready to load, the upper deck hatches were battened down, completely isolating that section of the ship, but the 'tween deck hatch covers were left off and no guard-rail was erected round the hatchway. Timber was stored in the 'tween decks leaving a space about 12 feet broad beside the hatchway. A seaman sent down to fetch some timber from the 'tween decks fell 40 feet into the hold for some unexplained cause. There was evidence that on this ship it was quite usual for men to be sent down to the 'tween decks after the making ready of the holds had been completed and the deck hatches had been battened down. In an action by the seaman against the shipowners, alleging negligence on their part as the cause of his injury, they relied on evidence to suggest that there was a general practice in ships at sea not to erect guard-rails in similar circumstances.

Held (Lord Morton of Henryton and Lord Porter dissenting) that the shipowners had not been proved to be in breach of their common law duty to the seaman.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

Jan. 31, 1956. Lord Morton of Henryton. My Lords, about 9 a.m. on October 13, 1951, the appellant, Robert Thomas Morris, a seaman aged 18 years, fell down hatch No. 2 on the 'tween deck of a vessel called the Daltonhall belonging to the respondents. He fell some 30 or 40 feet into the hold and sustained serious injuries. At the time when the accident occurred the appellant was classified as an " efficient deck hand " and he had been at sea about six months. His experience had been mostly on " home trade " passenger ships, but he had been to sea in a deep sea ship four or five times, including a voyage to the Persian Gulf.

The following summary of the relevant facts is taken, in substance, from the judgment of Parker L.J. [8]: " When the " [appellant] met with his accident, the vessel was on her way, " light, from Avonmouth to Montreal to load grain in bulk." (She had left Avonmouth on October 3, and was due in Montreal in three days.) " She had carried grain on her previous voyage " and in accordance with the normal practice in grain-carrying " ships her holds were being made ready on the voyage, so that " she could load on arrival at Montreal. This involved cleaning " out the holds one by one, repairing the feeders and shifting " boards, making them fast in position and generally making the " holds grain tight. In the process of making each hold ready, " men had to work close to the 'tween deck hatch, which had a " coaming of only 10 inches in height so as not to interfere with " the operation of swinging loads between the decks. At times, " they would have to sit on the hatch beams in order to fix the " shifting boards in position. With a 40 ft. drop from the " 'tween deck to the bottom of the hold, the preparation of the " hold was necessarily somewhat a dangerous operation albeit " one which sailors take in their stride despite the movement of " the vessel. As each hold was made ready the upper deck " hatch was battened down while the 'tween deck hatch covers " were left off ready for loading. This vessel, like other vessels, " carried stanchions which could be fitted round each hatch, and " a wire rope which could be fixed round the stanchions to form " a guard-rail. It was necessary to have these stanchions and " this wire in order to comply with the Docks Regulations while " in port, but this guard-rail could not be up while a hold was " being made ready, and was not in fact erected round the hold " after it had been made ready while at sea. Any timber not " required for repairs in a hold was stacked on the 'tween deck " beside the side of the ship, occupying 4 to 5 ft. of the 17 ft. " 3 in. space between the coaming round the hatch and the side.

" By October 13, 1951, holds Nos. 1, 2 and 3 had been made " ready, and work was in progress on No. 4 hold. The [appel- " lant] was one of those who had worked on all the holds. On " that day the [appellant] and two others, on the instructions " of the boatswain, went to fetch a piece of timber from the pile " of timber on the 'tween deck near No. 1 hold. Owing to there " being a bulkhead aft of No. 2 hold, it was necessary to open " part of the upper deck hatch covers and to descend to the " 'tween deck by means of a rope ladder. On the instructions " of the boatswain, these men opened about two sections on the " port side and descended. Not finding the desired piece of " timber in the pile by No. 1 hatch, they inspected two further " piles at and aft of No. 2 hatch. Still not having found the " desired piece, they were returning to the first pile in single " file, with the [appellant] last, when there was a scream and " the [appellant] fell down No. 2 hatch.

" Exactly how the accident happened will never be known. " The [appellant], who suffered grievous injuries, remembers " nothing, and the two men with him saw nothing of his fall. " It was alleged that the light was insufficient, but the evidence " did not bear this out, and the learned Judge did not so find. " It may be that the [appellant] lost his balance owing to the " movement of the ship, and this was the view taken by the " learned Judge, though it is only right to say that there was no " evidence of any unusual or sudden movement. As Mr. Burke, " one of the men with the [appellant], said: ' I do not know " ' how the sea was striking us; I do not remember. A bit of " ' sea was running, and a breeze, because she threw a small " ' amount of spray up. I do not recollect; I do not remember " ' that.' " The appellant was asked: " How was the ship " moving?" and replied: " She had a beam swell." He was then asked: " Was there any spray coming over the main deck " forward?" and replied: " I do not remember that."

The writ in the present action was not issued till January 15, 1954. Streafeild J. found that the respondents were negligent in failing to put a guard-rail round the open hatch, and awarded the appellant £10,960 damages, which included £960 agreed special damage. His judgment was set aside by the Court of Appeal (Denning and Parker L.JJ., Morris L.J. dissenting).

MORRIS
v.
WEST HARTLEPOOL STEAM NAVIGATION CO. LTD.
Lord Morton of Henryton.

My Lords, the nature of the evidence required to establish, as against an employer, that he has been guilty of negligence in failing to provide a safeguard for his workmen has recently been considered by this House in Paris v. Stepney Borough Council.[2] Lord Normand, in a passage which has often been cited since, said[3]: "The kind of evidence necessary to establish neglect of a "proper precaution was considered in Morton v. William Dixon "Ltd.[4] by Lord President Dunedin. That was an action by a "miner against his employers alleging negligence in failing to "take precautions against the fall of coal from the top of the "shaft into the space between the side of the shaft and the "edge of the cage. It was, of a course, a Scotch case, but in "my opinion there is no difference between the law of Scotland "and the law of England on this point. The Lord President "said[5]: 'Where the negligence of the employer consists of "'what I may call a fault of omission, I think it is absolutely "'necessary that the proof of that fault of omission should be "'one of two kinds, either to show that the thing which he did "'not do was a thing which was commonly done by other "'persons in like circumstances, or to show that it was a thing "'which was so obviously wanted that it would be folly in "'anyone to neglect to provide it.' The rule is stated with all "the Lord President's trenchant lucidity. It contains an "emphatic warning against a facile finding that a precaution is "necessary when there is no proof that it is one taken by other "persons in like circumstances. But it does not detract from "the test of the conduct and judgment of the reasonable and "prudent man. If there is proof that a precaution is usually "observed by other persons, a reasonable and prudent man will "follow the usual practice in the like circumstances. Failing "such proof the test is whether the precaution is one which the "reasonable and prudent man would think so obvious that it was "folly to omit it." In the same year, in the case of Gallagher v. Balfour Beatty & Co. Ltd.,[6] the Lord President (Lord Cooper) referred to Lord Normand's speech, just quoted, and observed: "The law . . . as epitomized in the Dunedin formula, "has been adopted in every textbook, and, as was observed in "Carroll v. Andrew Barclay & Sons Ltd.,[7] it has been used as a "proper direction to juries 'in scores of cases,' and also, may I "add, as a test of the relevancy of scores of cases of defective "system." The Lord President protested[8] against discarding "in favour of a milder version the formula which we have used "consistently for more than forty years, and which is sanctioned "by the highest authority." Later[9] he referred to Lord Normand's speech in the Paris case[10] as "the latest pronounce" ment on the subject," which " reverts to the forcible language " of the original formula."

My Lords, I refer to Gallagher's case [11] because I deprecate a tendency, manifested in the present and other cases, to substitute some other word for the word " folly " in Lord Dunedin's formula. Either the substituted word has the same meaning, in which case the substitution serves no useful purpose, or it has a different meaning, in which case the substitution is unjustified. The word " folly " was repeated by Lord Normand and myself in Paris's case [12] and there was no difference of opinion in the House as to the test to be applied, although there was a difference of opinion as to the result of applying it. In the present case attention was called, in the course of the argument, to the fact that in Paris's case [13] Lord Norman used the words " so " obvious," whereas Lord Dunedin in Morton's case [14] had used the words " so obviously wanted." I think it is clear that Lord Normand did not intend to introduce any qualification into Lord Dunedin's language. He merely desired to point out that in considering whether a precaution was " so obviously wanted " that it would be folly in anyone to neglect to provide it," the court must look at the matter from the standpoint of the reasonable and prudent man. I mention this matter because I can imagine contexts in which the word " obvious " might have a different meaning from " obviously wanted," but the word clearly bore the meaning " obviously wanted " in the context in which Lord Normand used it.

My Lords, I now return to the facts of the present case. It is manifest that the evidence, far from establishing that the erection of a guard-rail while the vessel was at sea was " a thing " which was commonly done by other persons in like circum- " stances " was all to the effect that for various periods up to 40 years it had never been done by persons in like circumstances. Your Lordships must therefore consider whether the appellant proved—for the onus was on him to prove negligence—that a reasonable and prudent owner or master of the Daltonhall would have thought, before the accident happened, that a guard-rail was " a thing which was so obviously wanted that it would be " folly in anyone to neglect to provide it."

My Lords, in my view the evidence falls very far short of proving this. In so saying I am differing from the view of the learned trial judge who heard the evidence, but in the present case there was no conflict between the witnesses, except possibly on the question whether men were " often " sent to fetch timber from the 'tween deck. On that question I accept the finding of Streatfeild J. that this was " quite usual." The case is therefore one in which the question is simply whether the facts proved do or do not give rise to the inference that the respondents were negligent. That question, as Lord Halsbury said in Montgomerie & Co. Ltd. v. Wallace-James,[15] "the original tribunal is in no "better position to decide than the judges of an appellate court." See also the observations of Viscount Simonds in Benmax v. Austin Motor Co. Ltd.[16]

To my mind, the appellant's allegation of negligence was disproved, to a large extent, by the only witness he called, the seaman Burke, who was with him when the accident occurred. Burke was an "able-bodied seaman" who had been four years at sea. I quote the following portion of his evidence:—

Mr. Lee: "Mr. Burke, while you were working down on the "'tween deck in No. 2 hold, and indeed No. 1 hold, had those "hatches on the 'tween deck ever been guarded by hatch-boards "or guard-rails while the ship was at sea?" (A.) "No, Sir, they "had never been covered; while we were working on that par-"ticular job they had never been covered."

Streatfeild J.: "Covered with what?" (A.) "Hatch-boards, "and there were no guard-rails."

Mr. Lee: "Mr. Burke, what was the practice in your four "years at sea; what is the practice with merchant shipping at "sea when there is work to be done getting the holds ready for a "cargo?" (A.) "In that case, when you are cleaning the hold "ready for grain, it is general to leave the hatches open in the "'tween deck; that is the usual thing; and as regards the safety "rails, for my part I have never seen safety rails erected in a "case like that. We had already swept and cleaned the 'tween "deck."

(Q.) "Once the work is finished, what happens then?" (A.) "When the work is finished you have no more reason to "enter the holds, if the work is finished, and the hatches are "still left uncovered."

Streatfeild J.: "But then if you had happened to go and do "some more work there, is there any reason why there should "not be any guard-rails?" (A.) "No reason, my Lord, no; but "there were no guard-rails, and I have never seen them used."

Later he said: "I have never heard of anyone asking or "demanding that guard-rails should be put round while at sea. "You would probably be laughed at, sir." I couple with that evidence the evidence of Mr. Clark, the chief officer (40 years at sea): "I have never seen guard-rails erected in my life"; of Mr. Barker, the boatswain (16 years at sea): "we never put "guard-rails up at sea"; and of Captain Lovegrove (35 years at sea): "in actual practice they are not put up at sea."

My Lords, in the face of this evidence, I would find it difficult to hold that a guard-rail round the hatch was a thing which was "so obviously wanted" that the owners and master of the Daltonhall, and inferentially the owners and masters of all the ships of a similar type on which these four experienced witnesses had sailed, were guilty of folly in failing to ensure that such a rail was erected. I agree with the observation of Denning L.J.[17] that "general practice weighs heavily in the scale, but it is not "conclusive," but, weighing all the circumstances of this case, I agree with Denning and Parker L.JJ. that the respondents are not proved to have been negligent. It must be borne in mind that once the work of cleaning and repairing hatches 1 and 2 had been finished, the portion of the 'tween deck which contained them was a completely enclosed space. The upper deck hatches were battened down and the bulkhead aft of No. 2 hatch cut off this portion of the 'tween deck. No one except members of the crew could go into this space while the ship was at sea, and there would appear to be no reason for any member of the crew to go there unless he was ordered, as the appellant was, to fetch timber from one of the three piles already mentioned.

I shall not detain your Lordships by travelling all through the evidence. No witness had heard of any similar accident occurring. The appellant was an active young man of 18 years who was training to be a heavy-weight boxer and had been at sea for six months, as he said, "more or less for the toughening up "process for boxing." The learned judge rejected the suggestion that the light was not good enough to enable him to see where he was going. He knew his way about and knew the exact position of the hatches as he had been working in the preparation of them. There is no evidence that the weather conditions were in any way exceptional. All that he had to do was to follow two other men past the hatch on a portion of the deck which was 12 feet wide at its narrowest point. Yet he fell through the open hatch. To my mind this was an extraordinary event which could not have been anticipated. I agree with Denning L.J.[17] that the words of Lord Thankerton in Glasgow Corporation v. Muir [18] are particularly appropriate: "The court must be careful to "place itself in the position of the person charged with the "duty . . . and not to give undue weight to the fact that a "distressing accident has happened."

Further, as Parker L.J. said,[19] the reasonable and prudent "employer is entitled to take into consideration the degree of "risk, if any, involved in taking precautionary measures . . . "If there was any real degree of risk in walking along the 12 ft. "gangway, then the risk of accident to a man putting up the "guard-rail by the edge of the coaming would be if anything "greater. Captain Lovegrove said: 'I think it'" (i.e. the erec- "'tion of a guard-rail) "'might be a degree more dangerous "'than doing a job a few feet away from the hatch . . . on the "'basis of movement of the ship.' The guard-rail would be only "a matter of a few inches from the coaming. And again: 'If I " ' had a personal choice myself between sending the seamen to " ' get a piece of timber from the wing of the deck, and giving him " ' the job of putting up the guard-rail, and the ship was rolling, " ' I would choose the former.' It is true that other witnesses " said that the guard-rail could have been put up without danger " in a very few minutes, but it is clear that they all took the " view that there was equally no danger in walking along the " gangway."

I think that Streatfeild J. based his decision in favour of the appellant largely upon two answers by Captain Lovegrove. He was asked whether, as a matter of precaution, guard-rails should have been erected and he answered: " In practice it is not done; " I do not say that they should not be erected, but in practice " it is not done." At the end of his evidence come the following questions and answers:

(Q.) " Well, now you know it has been brought home to us " all what happens to a young man, a strong and fit young man, " who is cast 40 feet down to another deck? " (A.) " Yes, but " apart from that, the accident, I would go on for quite a con- " siderable time not having guard-rails put up because it is not " the usual practice to put them up at sea."

(Q.) " But is it not time the practice was altered? " (A.) " I " agree."

My Lords, I agree with the majority of the Court of Appeal in thinking that these answers are too slender a basis for finding negligence against the respondents. Captain Lovegrove was, I think, being wise after the event, being moved, no doubt by regret that so sad an accident had happened. These two answers must be read together with the rest of his evidence, and he had already said, in agreement with all the other witnesses, that guard-rails never were put and had added that " it would not " occur to anybody to put them up."

In my opinion the respondents are not proved to have been guilty of any negligence, and I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD PORTER. My Lords, the relevant facts in this matter are contained in a very small compass. For my purpose it is enough to say that the plaintiff (the appellant) was one of three men sent down to the 'tween deck above Nos. 1 and 2 deep hold of the s.s. Daltonhall when on a voyage from Avonmouth to Montreal unladen, but with the purpose of loading grain at the latter port. Their object and instructions were to find spare boards suitable for use in No. 4 hold which was being cleaned for the reception of cargo at Montreal. That hold was separated from Nos. 1 and 2 by the central structure of the ship and in order to reach the latter some of the hatch coverings of the upper deck above No. 1 lower hold had to be removed. From this opening a certain amount of light was provided for the 'tween deck. One of the plaintiff's allegations in his pleading was that not enough light was given through the aperture thus provided to enable anyone engaged on a task in the 'tween decks to see his surroundings adequately. I refrain from discussing this point because there was little evidence that it had any effect upon the case and the learned judge who tried it thought a lack of light had no bearing upon the conclusion which he reached in favour of the plaintiff. Reliance was, however, placed upon the facts that the first two deep holds were open to the 'tween decks, were unprotected by any guard-rails fencing the open hatches and that the ship was rolling to an appreciable degree in a beam sea.

The boards on the 'tween decks in question were stacked in three positions—(1) against the skin of the ship opposite the aft end of No. 1 deep hold; (2) in a pile, again next to the skin of the ship opposite No. 2 hatchway; and (3) aft of No. 2 hatchway, and against a temporary bulkhead and some 12 feet inwards from the ship's port side. I ought to add that in each of the two former cases the pile of timber extended some 4 to 5 feet from the ship's side. In the direct line between the third pile and the second was a trimming hatch 11 feet behind No. 2 hatchway and 8 feet 8 inches from the ship's port side, so that anyone passing from the third to the second pile would have to go either to port or starboard of it.

The appellant was 18 years old at the relevant time, had been about 6 months at sea and four or five times in deep sea ships. He and Burke, an older and more experienced man, together with McCambridge, a boy of 17, were, on the day in question, the three persons sent to search for suitable timber in the 'tween deck; and it is clear that it was proper in performing this task that they should visit and search each of the three piles which have been mentioned. They did search all three piles, starting from that opposite No. 1 hold, proceeding thence to No. 2 and then to No. 3. In none of them did they find the type of material required, and by way of ensuring that they had not overlooked what they wanted they purposed to return to piles 2 and 1 in order to look again. All three men started to walk back from No. 3 to No. 2 pile, Burke and McCambridge leading and the appellant following. On their way a scream was heard and the appellant was found to have fallen into the deep hold No. 2 and to be very seriously injured.

The sole question for the consideration of your Lordships is whether the respondents were negligent in not fencing the hatchway into this hold.

There was at one time some suggestion that the hatches should have been replaced, but no great stress was laid upon this allegation as, admittedly, fencing round the hatch would have been an adequate safeguard, and the necessary stanchions and wire ropes were available and could easily have been erected in anything from 15 minutes to half an hour. Under Board of Trade Regulations it is obligatory to erect the fencing round open holds whilst the ship is in port unless work is actually being done at the hold in question. At sea there is no such requirement, and, indeed, the respondents claimed to have established in evidence a practice never to do so in a grain-carrying ship, as this one was, whilst at sea. The appellant, however, asserted that the practice had not been proved to be universal in all such ships and pointed out that in cross-examination Captain Lovegrove, the expert witness called on behalf of the respondents, acknowledged that he did not know the conditions in the Daltonhall or what the weather was like, or what work had been done or when and that he was just talking about general practice in saying that guard-rails were not put up at sea. Counsel for the appellants, not unnaturally, and perhaps wisely, did not pursue that matter with the witness any further. The witness was not, however, asked in what way this ship differed from other grain-carrying ships, and the weather and the work which had been done were established aliunde.

Apart from these matters Captain Lovegrove's evidence was that at sea the guard-rails were never erected; he "did not say "they should not be erected, but in practice it is not done." In cross-examination he was asked: "It is just really that it is not "done because seamen generally are expected to look after themselves," and replied: "They are not expected to look out for "themselves; it is their natural bent, and, being seamen, to be "able to handle themselves in all parts of ships in all weathers." The plaintiff had complained that he was apt to be seasick and therefore had not got his sea legs though the ship had been some 10 or 12 days at sea, and the witness was asked: "You have "seen, have you not, men who have not found their sea legs or "inexperienced deck hands staggering about the deck with a "sudden roll?" and replied: "Well, I must say that I have "noticed that the average young man to-day will gain his sea legs "very quickly; if for no other reason than to prove to his more "senior mates that he had got hold of the job." "Some," he added, "might find it more difficult, but not for very long after "leaving port; not in the case of the young men." It is only fair to add that he agreed that after the accident it was time that the practice of not putting up the guard-rails at sea was altered.

I have set out this evidence because it is, I think, the high water mark of the plaintiff's case on the question of the danger involved, and was claimed to give some support to the contention that the practice of never railing the 'tween deck hatchways when at sea had not been generally established. The rest of the evidence on behalf of either side did not accept the existence of any danger.

Burke, a plaintiff's witness, when asked in cross-examination: "If you had been sent down to the 'tween decks to carry out "some work and you knew it was going to take a little longer "than just looking for timber, you would have asked for a guard-"rail to go up," replied: "No, sir, I would not; it perhaps "would not have crossed my mind." As to guard-rails, his general evidence was that they were never put up at sea, though they may sometimes have been left up if erected previously in port. One can perhaps best exemplify Burke's view as to guard-rails by quoting a further portion of his evidence in cross-examination by the defendants' counsel, Mr. Hughes:

(Q.) "Mr. Burke, when you had been at sea on the other "ships, do I understand you to say that you had never seen "guard-rails on those other ships when the hatch-covers are off "the 'tween decks?"—(A.) "I cannot recollect seeing any. "They did not strike me as being important enough to me, if I "had seen them, to remember them."

(Q.) "You cannot recollect?"—(A.) "I cannot recollect, but "I have never heard of anyone asking or demanding that guard-"rails should be put round while at sea. You would probably "be laughed at, sir."

One more matter as to danger may conveniently be disposed of at this point. Captain Lovegrove, in his evidence, said that in his opinion the putting up of stanchions involved greater danger than passing along the 'tween deck with the hold open. Mr. Burke would have none of it. In his view it would not involve any appreciable danger, and, indeed, this was the general view of the other witnesses and was accepted by the learned judge. There was ample evidence to justify this finding, and, in my opinion, it would be wrong for your Lordships to differ from him.

None of the other witnesses appear to have been asked directly whether in their opinion, as seamen, they would have looked upon the task set to the three men as involving any danger, though in answer to a question by Mr. Lee, on behalf of the plaintiff, Mr. Barker, the bo'sun, who sent the men down and was called on behalf of the defendants, agreed that the presence of either hatches or a guard-rail would have prevented an accident, but his general attitude was, I think, that seamen were safe without them. His attitude can be illustrated by certain questions asked and answers given in examination in chief to Mr. Hughes.

(Q.) "We know that there were sockets for guard-rail "stanchions but that no guard-rails were put up."—(A.) "That "is correct."

(Q.) "As bo'sun, did you ever require them to be put up?"—(A.) "Well, I had only joined the ship myself seven days, and we "were finding them in various places round the 'tween decks. "I did not see any complete."

(Q.) "Were they ever put up to your knowledge when you "were on the ship?"—(A.) "Not that voyage."

(Q.) "Did you ask for them to be put up?"—(A.) "I never "asked; we do not usually ask for them; we are usually asked "ourselves to put them up for other people. We do not ask to "put them up, as we do not need them normally ourselves."

(Q.) "Just tell me why"—(A.) "Well, it is a case that we

" are used to the job more than other people, and we just do not " think of it, like the dockers; but I suppose if we had been " asked for them we would have had to put them up."

I have already dealt with Captain Lovegrove's evidence as to the practice of not putting up guard-rails round the hatches whilst at sea. The other witnesses without exception said that, although there was no difficulty in erecting them, it was in fact never done in this or any other ship so far as they knew. Mr. Clark, however, like Captain Lovegrove, accepted the view put to him in cross-examination that it might have been worth while to prevent this sort of thing happening if he and the bo'sun had put their minds to it, but here again he was speaking after the event.

One of the chief criticisms of this class of evidence was that the conditions in this ship might well be different from those in others, that the plaintiff was a young and inexperienced man, who had not got his sea legs, and that whereas some of the witnesses explained that the erection of guard-rails was unnecessary because members of the crew never, or at any rate seldom, entered the 'tween decks during the voyage, in fact in this ship and, indeed, in some others, men were not infrequently sent to them.

Though the plaintiff said he was constantly seasick, his fellows regarded him as a sufficiently experienced hand quite capable of looking after himself and thought that any seaman, after a few days out, would have gained his sea legs. Admittedly he had been working in the holds and knew of the open hatch, and it is not suggested that his seasickness was known to anyone. Nor was any evidence given or suggestion made as to the respects (if any) in which this ship differed from other grain-carrying ships.

As to the general practice of putting up guard-rails at sea, I can find no evidence that in this or any other grain ship they were ever erected. Moreover, there remains the fact that there are Board of Trade Regulations requiring their erection in port, whereas there are no regulations creating an obligation for their use at sea. It is possible, as was suggested, that the Board of Trade has no jurisdiction over ships outside the three-mile limit, but if it was a plain danger I should have expected it to be dealt with in some way.

Ultimately, the question is, would a reasonably prudent shipowner or seaman have foreseen the danger of this accident and guarded against it? Speaking for myself, I should not regard the passing along a 12-foot passage way, even in a moderate sea, as a danger to a seaman, nor should I have expected any seaman to have foreseen the likelihood of such an accident, especially after 40 years in which no accident was, at any rate, known to the witnesses to have occurred, nor was evidence of any such event having occurred forthcoming. Opinions differ, no doubt, and apparently the learned judge was impressed by the risk of an open hold. The Court of Appeal, on the other hand, by a majority took the view that no appreciable danger had been established. Morris L.J., however, who agreed with the learned judge, thought that if the plaintiff's route from number 3 to number 2 pile had led him to pass the starboard side of the trimming hatch and he had then walked directly forward he might pass within 3 feet of the open hatchway. No doubt he might, but he was proceeding not directly parallel to the sides of the ship but to the second pile, and if he did so, whether he went to port or starboard of the trimming hatch, his route to the second pile would never be less than 9 or 10 feet from the hatchway to number 2 hold.

I, myself, am a good deal influenced, and, I think, rightly, by evidence which seems to establish that the existence of any such danger would never have occurred to a seaman.

Apart from these considerations, I am additionally strengthened in my view by the evidence of the practice prevailing on grain ships. To my mind it is amply proved, and though some witnesses thought that the reason was because it was unnecessary to go to the 'tween decks between ports, yet they cast no doubt upon the existence of the practice itself. The practice is established, though the reason given for it may be mistaken. As to the difference between the obligation in port and at sea, it may well be that with dockers working round a hold it is desirable to take precautions which are not necessary in the case of seamen who have at least 9 or 10 feet of space between them and the open hold. At any rate, the difference in obligation in fact exists.

It was suggested that the reason why the danger was not appreciated was that no one had brought their minds to bear upon it.

In Bolton v. Stone [20] I expressed the view that defendants would be in a stronger position if the risk was so small that they never thought about it than if they had considered it and decided the risks were very small. I adhere to that view. Men do not stop to consider whether each step they take is safe. They act upon what is generally regarded as a safe course until some untoward event shows that they may have been mistaken, and then, as Lord Thankerton pointed out in Glasgow Corporation v. Muir,[21] one must be careful not to impute negligence from ex post facto events.

If the practice is fully established, as I think it is, I am content to follow the words of Lord Dunedin in Morton v. William Dixon Ltd.[22] as restated in this House by Lord Normand in Paris v. Stepney Borough Council.[23] Lord Dunedin's words are: "Where the negligence of the employer consists of what I "may call a fault of omission, I think it is absolutely necessary " that the proof of that fault of omission should be one of two " kinds, either to show that the thing which he did not do was " a thing which was commonly done by other persons in like " circumstances, or to show that it was a thing which was so " obviously wanted that it would be folly in anyone to neglect to " provide it." Lord Normand put the same opinion in his own words in this way [23]: " the test is whether the precaution is one " which the reasonable and prudent man would think so obvious " that it was folly to omit it." I quote the words, though for the purpose of this case I am content, without expressing any opinion as to its exact meaning, to construe " folly " as Parker L.J. did,[24] to mean no more than " imprudent " or " unreason- " able." To my mind, having regard to the practice, the omission to fence was neither imprudent nor unreasonable, much less an act of folly. " It is true," the learned Lord Justice added,[24] " that other witnesses," (i.e., other than Captain Lovegrove) " said that the guard-rail could have been put up without " danger in a very few minutes, but it is clear that they all took " the view that there was equally no danger in walking along " the gangway," and with this view I agree.

Accordingly, I am of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed, both because the evidence, to my mind, establishes that to a seaman no such accident would have been looked for, especially since in an experience lasting up to 40 years such an accident was unknown, and because it was not the practice in grain ships to put guard-rails round the hatchways to the lower hold whilst at sea.

I should add that if I thought the arguments equally balanced, I should think it my duty to follow the decision of the Court of Appeal.

Finally, it was urged upon us that the learned judge had the witnesses before him and was therefore in a better position than an appellate court to evaluate the evidence. Where belief in the accuracy of witnesses or their demeanour comes in issue I agree, but as I have pointed out, there is little dispute as to the facts save in two cases, in both of which I have followed the findings of the court of first instance. Otherwise it is not fact but inference from facts with which your Lordships are concerned, and in such a case an appellate court is in as good a position to determine the issue as is the judge who tried the case.

I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD REID. My Lords, a seaman may encounter a variety of grave and inescapable perils, and in comparison the risk to which the appellant was subjected in this case was very small. But it has not been argued that a shipowner is under any less duty than an occupier of premises on land to eliminate unnecessary risks so far as that is reasonable and practicable.

In the present case the appellant had to walk along a space on the 'tween deck some twelve feet wide between a pile of dunnage and an open hatchway. He knew the place and, even allowing for a permissible degree of inattention, I find some difficulty in understanding how, without foolhardiness or negligence, he could have come to be so near the hatchway as to fall into it. In the defence of this action the respondents pleaded "the defendants will contend that the said accident was caused "or contributed to by the plaintiff's own negligence" but this defence was abandoned at an earlier stage of the case. As there is now no plea of contributory negligence the case must be dealt with on the footing that it cannot be inferred from the evidence that the accident could not have happened without the appellant being guilty of negligence. The case could not be decided in favour of the respondents on a ground which they do not now plead. If we must take it that the accident may have happened without the appellant being negligent it necessarily follows that there was some risk to a seaman who was not negligent if he was required to walk past this open hatchway, and the only question is whether that was a risk which the respondents ought to have foreseen and eliminated. The appellant's case is that a guard-rail should have been erected, and that this could have been done with very little trouble, and would have prevented the accident.

In some cases it may be open to an employer to say that, although the accident shows that there was in fact a risk to a man who was not negligent, the kind of risk was such that it could not reasonably have been foreseen before the accident. But I do not think that that can be said in this case. An open hatchway is an obvious danger and, if a man can without negligence come sufficiently near it to fall into it, I do not see how it can be said that this is not reasonably foreseeable or that there is no risk at all of his doing so. For a young and active seaman it may be that the risk is small even when the ship is rolling, but there are so many ways in which a man may slip or lose his balance without that being solely due to his negligence that I do not think that a prudent employer would be entitled to assume that there was no risk at all of an accident even in rough weather.

The respondents rely on a statement of the law by Lord Dunedin in Morton v. William Dixon, Ltd.,[25] which has often been approved. I need only refer to the speech of Lord Normand in Paris v. Stepney Borough Council,[26] and the opinion of Lord President Cooper in Gallagher v. Balfour Beattie & Co., Ltd.[27] Morton, a bottomer in a pit, was injured by a piece of coal which fell down the shaft, and it was alleged that there ought to have been some sort of shielding contrivance to prevent this. There was no evidence that this was a common expedient and it was at least doubtful whether it was practicable in this particular shaft. Lord Dunedin said [28]: "Where the negligence of the "employer consists of what I may call a fault of omission, I "think it is absolutely necessary that the proof of that fault of "omission should be one of two kinds, either—to show that the "thing which he did not do was a thing which was commonly "done by other persons in like circumstances, or—to show that "it was a thing which was so obviously wanted that it would be "folly in anyone to neglect to provide it." Lord Normand having quoted this passage said [29]: "The rule is stated with all "the Lord President's trenchant lucidity. It contains an "emphatic warning against a facile finding that a precaution is "necessary when there is no proof that it is one taken by other "persons in like circumstances. But it does not detract from "the test of the conduct and judgment of the reasonable and "prudent man. If there is proof that a precaution is usually "observed by other persons, a reasonable and prudent man will "follow the usual practice in like circumstances. Failing such "proof the test is whether the precaution is one which the "reasonable and prudent man would think so obvious that it "was folly to omit it." In Gallagher's case [30] Lord Cooper, after expressing some apprehension that Lord Dunedin's test had been weakened by certain decisions, said that the passage which I have quoted from Lord Normand's speech "reverts to the forcible "language of the original formula, and in my view replaces it on "the pedestal from which it seemed to be dislodged."

Lord Dunedin's statement of the law must now be read with Lord Normand's gloss and it is important to see what it was that this House held to be "folly" in Paris' case.[31] A one-eyed garage hand, trying to remove from a vehicle a bolt which had rusted in, struck it with a hammer, and a metal chip flew off and injured his eye. He alleged fault in respect that his employer failed to provide him with and require him to wear suitable goggles. It was proved that it was not the practice to wear goggles at such work. It was not decided whether the employers were entitled to rely on this practice in the case of men with no disability, but it was in effect held that by reason of the more serious consequences to a one-eyed man if an accident causes him to lose the sight of an eye, goggles were for him "a thing "so obviously wanted that it would be folly in anyone to neglect "to provide it," or a precaution which "the reasonable and "prudent man would think so obvious that it was folly to "omit it."

I must now turn to the evidence in this case. This ship was one which carried grain in bulk and made the outward voyage in ballast. No. 2 'tween deck hatch, where the accident occurred, was partly open and partly occupied by a large wooden feeder which remained in position. Earlier in the outward voyage the hold had been cleaned out and the feeder and other woodwork repaired. There is evidence that a guard-rail could not have been put up while this work was going on because it would have impeded the work, and if there was negligence it was in failing to put up a guard-rail when the work was finished and before the men left that part of the 'tween deck. The only access to that part of the 'tween deck was by ladder from the upper deck where the hatches were battened down, and, if there was no likelihood of men being sent down to the 'tween deck during the remainder of the voyage, there was no point in guarding the open hatch and no obligation to do so. But the evidence in this case is that in this ship men were not infrequently sent down to the 'tween deck as the appellant was. He and two other men were sent down to look in the piles of dunnage for timber required for other work. So, when the cleaning and repair work at this hatch was finished, it ought to have been foreseen that men might well have to return to that part of the deck at some time during the remainder of the voyage, and the question is whether in that state of affairs it was negligent to leave unprotected that part of the open hatchway not occupied by the feeder.

There is evidence that the general practice was not to put guard rails round open hatches on the 'tween decks, but the evidence of some of the witnesses is that the reason for that practice was that no one was likely to go near the open hatches. Burke, an able seaman, said "You have no more reason to enter "the holds if the work is finished, and the hatches are still left "uncovered." Clark, the chief officer, said that there was no reason why guard-rails should not be put up, and when asked why it was not the practice to put them up, he said: "There is "really no necessity for them, because when the work is finished "in one hold there is no need for anybody to go down there;" and again: "Nobody goes down to the 'tween decks when there "is no work going on." He thought, wrongly, that the appellant ought not to have been in that part of the ship when the accident occurred.

Barker, the bosun, when asked why guard-rails were not put up, said: "The truth is that if the stanchions were there we "would have had a lot of trouble with the feeder: with that and "various other things." There is nothing to support this reason; the agreed plans do not support it and counsel were unable to explain how any such trouble could arise. This was, however, a good reason for not putting up guard-rails while cleaning operations were proceeding, and perhaps that is what the bo'sun had in mind.

The most important witness was Captain Lovegrove, who had many years' general experience. He said that in dock, when the regulations apply, guard-rails are put up at the beginning of the day by the ship's crew: I do not think that he meant that this was done every day but that it was done if the circumstances were such as to bring the regulations into operation. Then he explained that guard-rails are not put up at sea while cleaning and repairing is going on because they would impede the work, and when asked about putting up the guard-rails when that work is finished he said: "In practice it is not done; I do not say that "they should not be erected, but in practice it is not done." And when asked whether it would not be easy to put them up he said: "It would, yes, but it would not occur to anybody to "put them up." He said he had not personally known of an accident like this before; and then: (Q.) "If it had happened to "you would you have seen to it in future that guard-rails were "put up?" (A.) "I would, yes." (Q.) "Because you would "then realise the magnitude of the risk?" (A.) "Quite." Finally he said: "Apart from the accident I would go on for quite a con-"siderable time not having guard-rails put up because it is not "the usual practice to put them up at sea." (Q.) "But is it not "time the practice was altered?" (A.) "I agree."

I cannot find in Captain Lovegrove's evidence any indication whether or to what extent he thought that it was a general practice for men to go down to the 'tween deck during the voyage after the cleaning up is finished, but in giving his opinion that the practice of leaving 'tween deck hatches open was a bad practice I think he must have had in mind that the men are at least occasionally sent near these open hatches. Before leaving Captain Lovegrove's evidence I must note an answer which he gave about the danger of putting up guard-rails: he said: "If I "had a personal choice myself between sending the seamen to "get a piece of timber from the wing of the deck, and giving "him the job of putting up the guard-rail, and the ship was "rolling, I would choose the former." I think that he must have had in mind sending someone down specially to put up the rails. I can hardly think that he meant that there would have been any additional danger if the men who were cleaning and repairing at the open hatch stopped to put up rails before they left. If it had been right to leave the hatch open at that time because no one was likely to come near it again, and if later there had been some unexpected necessity for some men to go down there, then it would have been quite unreasonable to send someone down first to put up the rails. But, as I have said, the evidence shows that it ought to have been foreseen at the time of the cleaning operation that men might be sent down later in the voyage.

It was argued that, whether the practice of leaving the hatches unprotected was good or bad, the respondents were entitled to rely on it because it had gone on a long time and no one had heard of an accident arising from it. I would agree that, if a practice has been generally followed for a long time in similar circumstances and there has been no mishap, a reasonable and prudent man might well be influenced by that, and it might be difficult to say that the practice was so obviously wrong that to rely on it was folly. But an employer seeking to rely on a practice which is admittedly a bad one must at least prove that it has been followed without mishap sufficiently widely in circumstances similar to those in his own case in all material respects. This part of this case has caused me considerable difficulty, but I do not think that it has been proved that the circumstances were similar where the practice prevailed. There was no evidence that it was the practice in other ships for men to be sent to the 'tween decks after cleaning and repairing was finished and two witnesses thought it was not; on the other hand, there is evidence, accepted by the trial judge, that that was "quite usual" in this ship. And if in other ships this happened very seldom, then it is not surprising that no one had heard of an accident. If it ought to have been foreseen in this case, as I hold it ought, that men might be sent near this hatchway during the remainder of the voyage, I do not think that the respondents can rely on this practice as having absolved them from the duty to consider whether guard-rails ought to be put up.

Apart from cases where he may be able to rely on an existing practice, it is the duty of an employer, in considering whether some precaution should be taken against a foreseeable risk, to weigh, on the one hand, the magnitude of the risk, the likelihood of an accident happening and the possible seriousness of the consequences if an accident does happen, and, on the other hand, the difficulty and expense and any other disadvantage of taking the precaution.

Here the likelihood of an accident may have been small but at least it was sufficient to prevent the respondents from maintaining that the accident could not have happened without the appellant being negligent. And the consequences of any accident were almost certain to be serious. On the other hand, there was very little difficulty, no expense and no other disadvantage in taking an effective precaution. Once it is established that danger was foreseeable and therefore that the matter should have been considered before the accident, it appears to me that a reasonable man weighing these matters would have said that the precaution clearly ought to be taken. I am therefore of opinion that the appeal should be allowed.

LORD TUCKER. My Lords, this appeal turns almost entirely upon the evaluation to be placed upon the facts found by the trial judge which have been already referred to and as to which there has been very little dispute at any stage of the proceedings.

The open 'tween deck hatch with a drop of 40 feet was an obvious danger; the consequences of anyone falling to the bottom of the hold might well prove fatal and would almost inevitably be serious. The degree of danger would vary with the kind of weather encountered and with the skill and experience of the crew who were required from time to time to go to the 'tween deck to fetch pieces of timber which were stacked by the side of the ship, occupying some 4 or 5 feet of the 17 feet 3 inches space between the 9-inch coaming round the hatch and the ship's side, an operation which was performed in a subdued light.

The precise cause of the appellant's accident is unknown. The weather was not rough, but there was evidence that a "bit" of sea was running, and a breeze, because she threw a small "amount of spray up" and "she had a beam swell." The inference drawn by the trial judge and Morris L.J. that some movement of the ship was probably a contributing cause was, I think, fully justified.

What, then, was the explanation or justification for leaving this 'tween deck in that condition? It seems to have been accepted that in this particular type of ship it was not practicable to put the hatch covers on when the work of cleaning and repairing each hold was completed because a "feeder" used for loading grain was placed across the hatch. This being the position it was apparently not considered necessary to take the precaution of putting up the stanchions, which were available and carried on board in case they should be required in certain circumstances which may arise in the course of loading or unloading when in port, and using them with a rope to form a guard. The evidence clearly established that this could easily have been done in a very short time. I will return later to the possible danger involved in this operation.

The defence was that in doing as he did the master was merely following the invariable practice adopted at sea within the experience of witnesses, which covered a period of some 40 years, during which time no accident of this nature had occurred.

The value of this evidence as to the general practice is, I think, greatly diminished when it is closely examined. In the first place, in so far as it relates to all vessels without distinction, it is of no assistance because the use of guard-rails does not arise unless there are special reasons—as in the present case—why the hatch covers cannot be replaced, or where the circumstances do not require the crew to visit the 'tween deck in the ordinary course of their duties. So that it is only the practice of grain ships travelling in ballast that is relevant. The practice relied upon cannot, in my opinion, be justified. It was a practice which prevailed in all circumstances irrespective of weather conditions or the age and experience of the crew. It is said that in rough weather the upper deck hatches would not have been taken off and so access to the 'tween deck would not have been available, and that the bo'sun would use his discretion with regard to sending men to fetch these timbers in bad weather, even if it was possible to remove the upper deck hatch-covers.

My Lords, I cannot think that such a practice as this comes up to the standard required from a reasonably prudent employer whose duty it is to take reasonable steps to avoid exposing his servants to unnecessary risks. Sailors are, of course, necessarily exposed to many risks by the very nature of their calling, and no one would suggest that the courts should be ready to interfere with the practice based upon past experience with regard to such occupational risks, but the risk in the present case was not of this nature. It was obvious, its consequences were likely to be calamitous, and the remedy was simple and available. I do not consider that it is imposing too high a standard of care upon a master to require that he should take the precaution suggested, notwithstanding that no such accident had occurred before in his experience.

Evidence of general practice is often of great value and sometimes decisive but in such cases as these it may require close examination, and for the reasons which I have endeavoured to state I do not consider the very general practice relied upon in the present case stands up to such examination, or that its more limited application in the case of grain ships can be justified by the standard of the reasonably prudent employer.

There was one factor in the case which weighed with Parker L.J. in the Court of Appeal, to which I should refer. He took the view that if there was any real degree of risk in walking along the 12-foot gangway, then the risk of accident to a man putting up the guard-rail by the edge of the coaming would be, if anything, greater, and in this connexion he referred to the evidence of Captain Lovegrove, a witness for the defence, who had said: "If I had a personal choice myself between sending the seamen "to get a piece of timber from the wing of the deck, and giving "him the job of putting up the guard-rail, and the ship was "rolling, I would choose the former." No other witness had suggested any danger in putting up the guard-rail, but I think the real answer is that the two operations cannot properly be compared. In the first case the man may well not realize that he is in any danger and some slight inattention or slip may precipitate him, and this is the very reason why a guard of some kind is required; in the second operation the danger is obvious and the man or men performing it will have to take the necessary precautions. Moreover, if it is considered to require any exceptional degree of care or skill, men with the necessary qualifications can be chosen. In the one case you have an operation which can be carried out in a few minutes by skilled men, if necessary, and in the other you have all the crew at different times for appreciable periods of the voyage exposed to risks, the degree of which they may very well not fully appreciate. I cannot accept the view that the risk involved in putting up the guard-rail is of such a nature as to justify the omission or that it should turn the scale in favour of the respondents.

My Lords, the degree of care and foresight required from an employer necessarily varies with the circumstances of each case and it is a matter upon which there is scope for much difference of judicial opinion, as this case has shown. I can only say that, in my opinion, Streatfeild J. was fully justified for the reasons stated by him and for those given by Morris L.J. in the Court of Appeal, in holding that the respondents had been proved to have been in breach of their common law duty to the appellant. I would accordingly allow the appeal and restore the judgment of Streatfeild J.

LORD COHEN. My Lords, I need not recapitulate all the facts. Suffice it to say that, as they strike me, the salient admitted facts appear to be, on the one hand, the size of the gaping hole in the 'tween decks when the hatch is opened, the risk of anyone in the vicinity falling down if he loses his balance, the obvious gravity of the injuries which were likely to be done to anyone who fell through that hole, the easiness of taking the precaution of fixing the stanchion and wire rope fence around the open hatch and the fact that the saving of time in not erecting it was negligible; on the other hand, the width of the passage, some 12 feet, between the stack of dunnage and the open hatch, the fact that only seamen would be passing along that passage, the fact that, according to the evidence, it was not the practice aboard grain ships to fence in open hatches 'tween decks or cover them up after the holds had been made ready for reloading, and the fact that no evidence was given of any occurrence of a similar accident by any of the witnesses, one of whose experience went back some 40 years. There was one disputed fact to which some importance attaches, and that is the frequency with which it was necessary for members of the crew to have access 'tween decks after the holds had been made ready. On that point I think it is clear that the learned judge accepted the evidence of the boatswain, Mr. Barker, to the effect that men were often sent down 'tween decks to collect pieces of timber for use in connexion with repair work, and I am not prepared to differ from him on that point.

What is the law to be applied to those facts? Mr. Forrest relied on the observations of Lord Dunedin in Morton v. William Dixon Ltd.[32] as approved and applied by Lord Norman in Paris v. Stepney Borough Council[33]: "Where the negligence of the "employer consists of what I may call a fault of omission, I "think it is absolutely necessary that the proof of that fault of "omission should be one of two kinds, either to show that the "thing which he did not do was a thing which was commonly "done by other persons in like circumstances, or to show that "it was a thing which was so obviously wanted that it would "be folly in anyone to neglect to provide it."

I agree with the view expressed by Parker L.J. in the Court of Appeal[34] that the use of the word "folly" may lead to misconception of what the law is if it is read in the sense of "ridiculous," but I do not think this was the sense in which Lord Dunedin used it. Lord Normand, after quoting Lord

Dunedin, continued: "The rule is stated with all the Lord "President's trenchant lucidity. It contains an emphatic warn- "ing against a facile finding that a precaution is necessary when "there is no proof that it is one taken by other persons in like "circumstances. But it does not detract from the test of the "conduct and judgment of the reasonable and prudent man." I think that the effect of their Lordships' observations is that when the court finds a clearly established practice "in like cir- "cumstances" the practice weighs heavily in the scale on the side of the defendant and the burden of establishing negligence, which the plaintiff has to discharge, is a heavy one.

In applying the law as laid down by Lord Normand to the present case the first question that arises is whether the circumstances existing on board the ships as to which evidence of practice was given are like those prevailing on board the s.s. Daltonhall. I share the doubt expressed by Morris L.J. as to whether that was proved to be the case, since both Mr. Burke and the chief officer, Mr. Clark, seemed to say that when any section of the 'tween deck had been swept and cleaned there was ordinarily no more reason to enter the hold, whereas Mr. Barker, as I have already said, deposed that it was often necessary to do so on the Daltonhall.

But even if the circumstances can be regarded as like, I should still be of opinion that the appellant is entitled to judgment. Applying the test laid down by Lord Normand, Parker L.J. says[34]: "What, then, is the reasonable and prudent "employer bound and entitled to take into consideration? He is "certainly (1) bound to take into consideration the degree of "injury likely to result; (2) bound to take into consideration the "degree of risk of accident; (3) entitled to take into consideration "the degree of risk, if any, involved in taking precautionary "measures."

Later on in his judgment he indicates that the decision of the matter in each case must depend on whether, balancing these considerations, (and, I would add, taking into account any other factors which may be relevant in a particular case) the plaintiff has proved that the omission of the precaution relied on by the plaintiff was a thing which the defendants, as reasonable and prudent employers, should have thought so obvious that it was unreasonable or imprudent to omit it.

My Lords, I agree with this approach, but, proceeding along those lines, I have arrived at the opposite conclusion to that reached by Parker L.J. There was an obvious risk in being near to the open hatch: it was one to which the plaintiff became exposed in carrying out the duty assigned to him; the consequences of an accident would obviously be very serious; the risk was an unnecessary risk in that it could easily have been avoided and no sort of advantage resulted from its existence. In these circumstances it seems to me that on the evidence the trial judge and Morris L.J. were justified in holding that the appellant had established that the respondent had omitted a precaution which, in the sense in which I understand Lord Normand's words, it would be folly to neglect to take.

My Lords, the respondents, as I think wisely, did not press their contention that the damages were excessive, and for the reasons I have given I would allow the appeal and restore the judgment of the trial judge.

Appeal allowed.

Residence—Divorce—"Ordinarily resident" in England—Wife "ordinarily resident" while sailing to England—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (14 & 15 Geo. 6, c. 25), s. 18 (1) (b).

Early in 1951 the parties, who had hitherto lived domiciled in England, left for Australia where the wife understood that the husband was to be employed for a temporary but indefinite period. They left the matrimonial home and furniture in possession of her parents as caretakers.

After the parties reached Australia circumstances arose as a result of which the wife returned to England, sailing from Sydney on September 11, 1951, and arriving at Southampton on November 4, 1951.

The husband remained in Australia, the parties never resumed cohabitation, and on October 5, 1954, the wife filed a petition for divorce alleging that the parties were domiciled in England. The husband, by his answer, claimed an Australian domicile and the wife thereupon amended her petition to allege that the court had jurisdiction, in the alternative, under section 18 (1) (b) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950.

At the trial of an issue as to jurisdiction for the purpose of which it was assumed that the husband was domiciled in Australia:—

Held, (1) that, on the facts of the case there never was a real interruption of the ordinary residence of the wife in England.

(2) That even if there had been such an interruption, the wife had become ordinarily resident in England when she boarded the ship on September 11, 1951; to take the view that a person such as the wife, who was no nomad but a woman accustomed to live in a permanent home, had during the period of her voyage no ordinary residence anywhere at all would be quite artificial. Having no intention further to reside in Australia, the only ordinary residence that could be imputed to her during the period of the voyage was that of her previous home in England to which she was returning.

ISSUE as to jurisdiction.

The parties were married in England on October 24, 1942, and resided in England until the beginning of 1951, at an address stated to be 15, Addisland Court, Addisland Road, London. During the time they were in England they carried on together a business as hairdressers; but their business ran into difficulties and was given up some time in 1950. The flat at Addisland Court was taken in the wife's name and according to her evidence it was to a large extent furnished by her. During most of the time the wife's parents made their home with the parties and resided with them at the flat in Addisland Court. The wife stated in evidence, however, that it was her home and her husband's home, and that her parents were in effect merely guests.

At the end of 1950, having failed in his own business, the husband took employment with Elizabeth Arden, Ltd. For a short time he was sent to work for them in Paris, but early in 1951 it was decided that he should go to Australia, to work for them in Sydney. The firm paid his fare: the wife decided that she would go with her husband and take the one child of the marriage, a daughter born in 1944. The fare for the wife and the daughter was not paid by the firm; that had to be found by the parties themselves. On leaving, the parties did not dispose of the flat where they had lived. The wife left her furniture there and she left her parents still in occupation of the flat. The wife's mother died shortly after the departure of the parties.

According to the wife's evidence it was intended by Elizabeth Arden, Ltd. that the husband should sign a contract to work for them for two years in Australia. In fact he never did sign such a contract, and after a short time his employment with Elizabeth Arden, Ltd. terminated, although he did succeed in obtaining other employment in Sydney. The wife stated in evidence that until she was on the way to Australia she did not even know about the plan to sign a two years' contract. Her understanding of the venture was that it was only intended to be a temporary stay in Australia, and she contemplated that all three of them, the husband, wife and child, would be returning to England after about six months or, at any rate, within the year.

The wife stated that when they got to Australia they did not like it very much, and various circumstances arose to encourage her, at any rate, to change her mind. The parties discussed the possibility of the husband going to South Africa to get work where the wife had a number of relatives resident in Johannesburg. Another factor which had to be considered was the serious illness of the child of the marriage during the summer of 1951. The wife stated that it was decided, by agreement between the parties, that she should return to England, taking the child with her, partly for the purpose of treatment for the child, and partly because she wanted to look after her father who was left alone. In the meantime the husband was to pursue the plan, or at least investigate the plan, for obtaining employment in South Africa. The wife in fact sailed for England without him, on board a vessel called the "Largs Bay" belonging to the Aberdeen and Commonwealth Line, on September 11, 1951. It did not arrive in Southampton until November 4, 1951. On arrival in this country the wife went back to what had always previously been her home, namely, 15 Addisland Court, and since then had continuously resided at that address.

On October 5, 1954, the wife filed a petition for divorce on the ground of adultery in which she alleged that the parties were domiciled in England. By his answer of January 17, 1955, the husband claimed an Australian domicile, denied the adultery, and alleged that the wife had deserted him. The wife, by an amendment of February, 1955, alleged that if, which she did not admit, the parties were not domiciled in England the court had jurisdiction under section 18 (1) (b) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950.[1] An issue as to jurisdiction was ordered to be tried as to whether the wife (the plaintiff) had been ordinarily resident in England for a period of three years preceding the commencement of her suit. It was assumed for the purpose of the issue that the husband was domiciled in Australia, without prejudice to the wife's contention that the parties were domiciled in England.

At the hearing of the issue the wife gave evidence and was cross-examined on behalf of the husband, but the husband who remained in Australia did not give evidence.

G. H. Crispin and W. J. K. Millar appeared for the wife.
H. V. Brandon appeared for the husband.

WILLMER J. stated the facts substantially as set out above, referred to section 18 (1) (b) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, and said that for the purposes of argument at the hearing it had been assumed that the husband was domiciled in Australia. His Lordship continued: The petition was dated October 4, 1954, and filed on October 5, 1954. In those circumstances it is clear that the wife had then in fact been continuously resident in this country only for a period of two years and eleven months. When I say continuously resident in this country I mean physically within the boundaries of this country. It is, however, contended on her behalf, as one of the ways in which her case is presented, that from the time the ship cast off her moorings in Australia the wife, who was bound for England, must be regarded as ordinarily resident in England. The burden of proof is upon the wife, who is asserting the jurisdiction of the court upon this ground of residence.

[1] Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 18 (1): "Without prejudice to "any jurisdiction exercisable by the "court apart from this section, the "court shall by virtue of this section "have jurisdiction to entertain pro- "ceedings by a wife in any of the "following cases, notwithstanding "that the husband is not domiciled "in England, that is to say:—. . . "(b) in the case of proceedings for "divorce or nullity of marriage, if the "wife is resident in England and has "been ordinarily resident there for a "period of three years immediately "preceding the commencement of the "proceedings, and the husband is not "domiciled in any other part of the "United Kingdom or in the Channel "Islands or the Isle of Man."

The wife puts her case in two ways. On the one hand, she contends that she was resident in this country at the moment of filing the petition and that she has always been ordinarily resident in this country. On that basis she contends that the relatively short period during which she and the child were physically in Australia, was not such a gap as could be regarded as terminating her ordinary residence in this country. In the alternative, should it be held against her that, on leaving for Australia, she ceased to be ordinarily resident in this country, it is contended on her behalf that she resumed ordinary residence in this country from the moment that her ship left Sydney. On that alternative basis, if the argument be acceded to, then she can get three years of ordinary residence preceding the presentation of the petition. But, as I have already said, she cannot get three years' ordinary residence if I have to take the date that the ship arrived in this country.

I have been referred to the judgment of Karminski J. in Stransky v. Stransky,[2] but the only part of it to which I think I need refer is that in which he quotes[3] the words of Somervell L.J. in Macrae v. Macrae.[4] It seems to me that the whole of the law which I have to administer in this case is summed up in one short passage from the judgment of Somervell L.J. where he says[5]: "Ordinary residence can be changed in a "day. A man is ordinarily resident in one place up till a "particular day: he then cuts the connexion he has with that "place—in this case" (that is Macrae v. Macrae[6]) "he left his "wife; in another case he might have disposed of his house or "anyhow left it and made arrangements to make his home some-"where else. Where there are indications that the place to which "he moves is the place which he intends to make his home for at "any rate an indefinite period, then as from that date in my "opinion he is ordinarily resident at the place to which he has "gone." I propose to endeavour to apply that statement of the law to both aspects of this case, i.e. to test both of the alternative contentions put forward on behalf of the wife by reference to that statement of the law.

For the husband it is the last sentence of that passage from the judgment of Somervell L.J.[7] which is particularly relied on. It is contended by Mr. Brandon that this is a case where there were all the indications that the place to which the parties moved in 1951, namely Australia, was a place where they intended to make their home "for at any rate an indefinite period." In those circumstances it is contended on behalf of the husband that from the time of arrival in Australia, namely March, 1951, the parties became ordinarily resident in Australia.

On behalf of the wife, on the other hand, it is the earlier sentence which is much relied on,[8] that in which Somervell L.J. refers to the case of a man—the same would apply to a woman—who "cuts the connexion" with the place where he has been resident. Somervell L.J. instances what was the fact of that case, namely, the case of a man deserting his wife; but he also instances the case of a man who has disposed of his house. It is pointed out that nothing like that happened in this case. On the contrary these parties had a settled matrimonial home at Addisland Court. That home was never disposed of. It was throughout retained as a place to which they could return and in the interim the wife's parents were left in residence there.

The wife's evidence with regard to what she knew about the proposed length of the stay in Australia was challenged by Mr. Brandon in cross-examination. I have, of course, heard no evidence on the other side. I do not think that it is necessary to form any concluded view as to the correctness or otherwise of the wife's evidence on this point, and if I can avoid doing so I should certainly wish to avoid it, as I do not want to say anything on this preliminary issue which might in any way prejudice hereafter the question of the credibility of the parties. I think that it is sufficient to say that she regarded it as a visit to Australia which was intended to be of limited duration, although what the precise limit was going to be was left indefinite. To that extent I think that the husband is well founded in saying that it was to be a residence in Australia for an indefinite period. On the other hand, I must confess that I am very impressed, in the wife's favour, by the other indications detailed in her evidence, namely the fact that this was her own flat in Addisland Court, where she had her own furniture, where she had left her household gods, and where she had left her parents, so to speak, as caretakers. That all goes to confirm her evidence that the stay in Australia was always intended to be of only temporary duration, and that at the date of departure, and indeed during the term of the wife's residence in Australia, there was always an intention at some time in the future to return to the matrimonial home in England. In those circumstances, I think the proper view to take on the facts of this case is that, as in Stransky v. Stransky,[9] there never was any real interruption of the ordinary residence of the wife in England; that is to say, I find on the facts that during the temporary stay in Australia the wife remained ordinarily resident in England.

If I am wrong in that, however, I should like to add that I should in any case have come to the conclusion that this court has jurisdiction to entertain this case, on the basis that a period of ordinary residence of three years in this country has been established, having regard to the fact that the wife left Australia on September 11, 1951. Upon this alternative point the argument put forward—and a very persuasive argument, if I may say so—by Mr. Brandon was that the period before November 4, 1951, cannot be treated as though it were a gap in a current period of residence. When the statute requires that there should be a period of three years' ordinary residence (so the argument goes), you must find that at some time there was a beginning to that ordinary residence. It is not good enough to say that there has in any case been two years and eleven months, and that the other month can be treated as a gap like the gaps in Stransky v. Stransky.[9] Mr. Brandon says that you cannot find a gap until you have found that a period of the ordinary residence has already begun. If I am wrong in thinking that there was throughout ordinary residence in this case, then it becomes, I agree, necessary for me to fix the date when the wife did once again become ordinarily resident in this country; and the choice as I see it is between November 4, 1951, from which date it is conceded that she has been ordinarily resident in this country, and, on the other side, September 11, 1951. Mr. Brandon says that the wife cannot be taken as being ordinarily resident in this country until she arrives here, whereas it is said on the other side, that even if not ordinarily resident here before, she became ordinarily resident in this country when she, so to speak, burnt her boats in Australia and boarded the ship which was to take her to England.

I think myself that that is a matter which has to be viewed in the context of all the other circumstances of the case. I think that there may be a difference between the case of a person who boards a ship to go to a country where he or she has no roots and no immediate connexion, and a case like this where the party boards a ship to return to the place which has previously been that party's home and where that party has his or her roots. It is only to a case of the latter kind that I am applying my mind at the moment, and I do not wish it to be thought that I am deciding in this case what is the appropriate inference to be drawn in other cases from the fact of a party boarding a ship to travel from one country to another. In this case I have regard

LEWIS v. LEWIS.

to the fact that at the time when the wife left Australia there was, as appears from the evidence, and as is apparently corroborated by the letters received by the wife and put in evidence before me, no real intention further to reside or make the matrimonial home in Australia, and I have also regard to the fact that the wife had throughout maintained her flat in this country, where one of her parents was still residing and where she had her furniture. When she boarded the ship in Australia she was boarding it for the purpose of returning to what had previously been her home. In those circumstances it seems to me that, even if she had not been ordinarily resident in England throughout, then the fact of her setting foot on board the ship which was to bring her home from Australia was, in its context, to be interpreted as a resumption of ordinary residence in this country. I asked the question in argument, what would the wife have answered if she had been casually asked by someone else in the course of her voyage home "What is your ordinary "residence?" Certainly she would not have said Australia. I apprehend that she would have answered without hesitation: "15 Addisland Court, Addisland Road, London."

It is said that ordinary residence, unlike domicile, is not a thing that everyone is necessarily deemed to have at all. There are, of course, nomadic people who have no ordinary residence anywhere. I do not propose to deal with that class of case, except to remark that no one can suggest that either of the parties in this case was a nomad. I think one has got to approach the facts of this case on the basis that we are dealing with people who are accustomed to live in permanent homes of one sort or another. In those circumstances I think that it would be quite artificial to take the view that a person such as this wife, during the period of her voyage between Australia and England, had no ordinary residence anywhere at all. If she is to be regarded as having an ordinary residence during that period, the only ordinary residence that I can in the circumstances of this case impute to her is an ordinary residence in this country.

For those reasons, on both grounds which I have attempted to set out, I come to the conclusion that this wife was both resident in this country at the date of the presentation of the petition, and had been ordinarily resident, within the meaning of the statute, during a period exceeding three years prior to the presentation of the petition.

Order accordingly.

* CUNDY v. CUNDY, SMITH AND FINCH.

1955
Dec. 6, 7, 8, 9, 12, 13.

Mr. Commissioner Blanco White Q.C.

Husband and wife — Divorce — Condonation — Revival of condoned offence—Conduct sufficient to revive.

DEFENDED PETITION for divorce.

The parties were married in 1921 and had five children, the parentage of a child born in 1932 being in dispute. In 1927, at the age of 24, the wife committed adultery with one man; in 1931 she committed adultery with another. The parties continued to live together, to share the same bed, and to have marital intercourse until 1949, although from 1941 there was no affection between them. The husband left the home in 1949. A charge of adultery brought by him in 1950 in a court of summary jurisdiction was dismissed without the wife being called on to give evidence.

The husband filed a petition for divorce on the grounds of (constructive) desertion and of adultery revived by subsequent misconduct; the wife by her answer cross-prayed for a divorce on the ground of desertion, admitting the adultery in 1927 and 1931, pleading that it had been condoned and denying that it had been revived.

During the course of his judgment the commissioner, rejecting other allegations as to the wife's behaviour, found that on one occasion in 1950 the wife had been kissed on the neck by a man, who had been helping her in the garden, without protest by her. The question was raised whether that incident was sufficient to revive the condoned adultery. The commissioner said that it was very hard to find authority as to what degree of impropriety in conduct revived adultery, and formulated his conclusions upon that question as follows:—

The question whether impropriety of conduct on the part of a wife is sufficient in gravity to revive condoned adultery is ultimately one of fact. There must be taken into consideration (1) the circumstances of the adultery and the light it throws on the character of the wife; (2) the time which has elapsed since the adultery; (3) the behaviour of the wife meanwhile; (4) the behaviour of the husband to the wife; (5) the seriousness of the conduct complained of and its circumstances, including the manners and customs of the grade of society to which the parties belong. The test is whether a jury of reasonable citizens guiding themselves by the foregoing considerations would be of opinion that the conduct complained of was of sufficient gravity and weight to exonerate the husband from his expressed or implied promise to forgive his wife and to entitle him to reassert the adultery as a ground for divorcing her. To say that something is a question of fact for the jury is much the same as to say it is a matter of discretion for the court to be exercised on proper principles. I have included among the things to be considered the behaviour of the husband to the wife, because I think it clear that that is a matter which must be taken into consideration. If a wife were found guilty of adultery and the husband had previously deserted her or had been guilty of conduct conducing to the adultery, then the ultimate decision would be in the discretion of the court. To revive adultery something less than adultery may be relied on and in considering whether a lesser offence revives the adultery, just as in considering whether a decree is to be granted on an actual finding of adultery, I think it clear that the husband's behaviour also must have been considered, and would have been considered in the ecclesiastical courts. That is the best formulation I can make.

Endeavouring to apply those principles to this case what does it come to? Here is a wife who twice committed adultery when she was in her twenties. So then, you may take it that in her twenties the husband had got a very great deal to complain about with regard to her fidelity. On the other hand, she was in her twenties; that was nineteen years before the occasion in 1950. For nineteen years she had led a respectable life. There was nothing against her. She had done well by the children and she had done well in the keeping of the house. After eighteen years she is deserted by her husband. After she is deserted by her husband she gets a friend in to do her gardening for her. When he has finished doing her gardening he goes up to her where she is standing, puts his arm round her and gives her a kiss. I do not believe that any reasonable jury in this world would consider that that was conduct exonerating the husband from his forgiveness in the circumstances, the wife having lived respectably for nineteen whole years. In fact, frankly, I am not certain that what took place was anything different from the customary kiss which a young man gives a young woman in certain circles on seeing her home after taking her out for the evening; he has given her a nice evening, he is entitled to give her a kiss. And I am not certain that what took place here was not that the man had done a good afternoon's gardening, digging up the wife's garden on an extremely hot day, and having done it, when he was going home to his tea he felt entitled to give her a kiss in the same way. I am quite satisfied that it would be totally unreasonable to regard that incident as reviving the adultery.

The commissioner then held that the husband was guilty of desertion and granted the wife a decree nisi of divorce.

A clause in a contract for the hire of a crane provided, "The "driver or operator (if any) supplied by owners shall be respon- "sible for driving or operating the plant but shall use it and be "under the direction and supervision of the hirer who shall be "responsible for his action as though the driver were in the hirer's "direct employ."

On a claim under the terms of the contract for indemnity from the hirer of the crane in respect of damages awarded against the owner for the negligence of their crane driver when driving the crane while on hire.

Held that, on the true construction of the clause, when the driver was using or working the plant under the direction and supervision of the hirer, as in the present case, the hirer was responsible for the driver's action (including his negligence) as though the driver were in the hirer's direct employ; the clause determined the liability of the two employers inter se and, accordingly, the owners of the crane were entitled to indemnity from the hirer.

THIRD PARTY PROCEEDINGS.

The plaintiff, who was employed by the first defendants at a building site, was struck and injured by the jib of a crane owing to the negligence of the crane operator. The crane was owned by Chamberlain Industries Ltd., the second defendants, and was operated by one McManus their servant; but it had been hired to City Plant Hirers Ltd., the third party. They had in turn sublet the crane to the first defendants. The crane was hired to the third party under a contract which contained, inter alia, the following terms, which are usual in the building trade: "The "driver or operator (if any) supplied by owners shall be respon- "sible for driving or operating the plant but shall use it and be "under the direction and supervision of the hirer who shall be "responsible for his action as though the driver were in hirer's "direct employ."

There was also terms on re-hiring as follows:—"Hirer shall "not sub-let the plant or any part of it without first receiving

"the written permission of owners". With regard to insurance the contract provided: "Drivers and operator where supplied by "owners. Liability under the Workmen's Compensation Act is "insured by a policy in the joint names of the owners and the "hirers. Where insurance is provided it is in accordance with "the usual conditions applicable in each case. In all cases the "hirer for the time being is jointly insured with the owners, and "must observe the conditions and take all reasonable precau-"tions for the safety of the plant and its safe use. All plant is "insured against fire, and where other insurance is provided it "will include indemnity for liability for injury to persons and "damage to property of third parties, (which does not include "persons in the employ of the hirer or property owned by him "or in his custody and control)."

In these proceedings the second defendants claimed indemnity against the third party under the terms of the hiring agreement in respect of a judgment given against them in the main action for £7,500, on the ground of their vicarious responsibility for the negligence of the crane driver.

F. W. Beney Q.C. and G. R. F. Morris for the second defendants.

Norman Wiggins for the third party.

The following cases were cited in argument: Mersey Docks & Harbour Board v. Coggins and Griffith (Liverpool)[1]; Denham v. Midland Employers Mutual Assurance Ltd.[2]

PEARCE J. stated the facts and continued: Mr. Wiggins, on behalf of the third party, argued that the printed terms are not part of the contract, first, because they were not signed, secondly, because there was no sufficient evidence of a course of practice to justify the printed conditions being embodied by implication in the hire, and, thirdly, that a fortiori did both those arguments apply in a case of re-hire to which the third party did not think that such terms were applicable.

But I am satisfied of these facts: The third party had regularly done business with the second defendants, always on the basis of the printed forms of general conditions of hire. These were sent by the second defendants to the third party on at least 17 occasions, and on 12 occasions they were sent back signed. On all or most of these occasions there was a re-hire of the machinery by the third party. I do not believe that they were merely signed for the purposes of reference. The third party were well aware of what those printed terms were, and they were aware that those were the terms on which the second defendants insisted on doing business. Never in any of the previous transactions were those terms ever altered or was there any protest against them. The third party as well as the second defendants always understood that those terms were the basis on which the business was done over the telephone. I do not believe that the fact that there was a re-hire made the third party take the view that the terms were not applicable.

Mr. Wiggins argues that, even assuming the alleged terms are part of the contract, the material clause does not amount to an indemnity. It has, he says, two limbs dealing with two different situations and is not to be read as dealing with one general situation. The first limb is "the driver or operator "supplied by owners shall be responsible for driving or operating "the plant." The second limb is "but shall use it and be under "the direction and supervision of the hirer who shall be respon- "sible for his action as though the driver were in hirer's direct "employ." In other words, first, the driver shall be responsible for the driving, that is, how he drives, but, secondly, he shall be under the direction and supervision of the hirer as to what he is to do, and in respect of that, and that only, namely, when that direction or supervision causes disaster, the hirer is to be responsible for the driver's action.

Mr. Beney's answer to that is that the hirer would be liable anyhow in that respect, namely, if the driver properly followed a negligent instruction by the hirer, and there is no need to put the words in at all unless they are intended to apply to cases (as this) where a driver negligently follows a proper instruction by the hirer. Moreover he argues that, if Mr. Wiggins' argument is correct, the words "as though the driver were in the hirer's "direct employ" are otiose, since there is no need to import the notion of a vicarious responsibility in a matter in which the hirer has by his own direction, intervention and supervision caused the damage.

Mr. Wiggins claims that even if his construction is not correct it is at least sufficiently plausible to make the clause ambiguous; The fact of re-hire makes it still more ambiguous and inapplicable and, as the second defendants are the proferentes, the document should in case of doubt be construed against them.

In my opinion, the question of re-hire does not prevent the clause from being applicable. The terms themselves envisage the possibility of re-hire by imposing the necessity for written leave—leave which is by implication given by the second defendants typing the words "Less 10 per cent. re-hire dis- "count" in the column devoted to the hiring rates.

If any term is meaningless or absurd in relation to the position on re-hire, then it could not be applied, but in my view that is not the position in this case. There are various terms in which the hirer has duties and liabilities which, if he re-hires, he will in practice have to carry out vicariously through the sub-hirer. It is for him to see that his agreement with the sub-hirer provides for these and compels the sub-hirer to undertake them. Unfortunately, as we know, in this case the sub-hirer crossed out the clause relating to indemnity by him to the third party in the re-hire contract.

HERDMAN v. WALKER (TOOTING) LTD. CITY PLANT HIRERS LTD. (THIRD PARTY).

Lastly, Mr. Wiggins claims that the conditions say that insurance is provided, or indicate at least by inference that it covers any third party matters, and, therefore, it would be an improbable inconsistency for the agreement to provide an insurance while imposing an indemnity.

But the normal reading of the words relating to insurance does not bear this inference. The document does not say that complete third party insurance is provided, and I do not believe that the third parties were misled. They are not people who are ignorant of the nature of insurance in these transactions, seeing that they have carried on this business themselves for years. Nor do I think that the references to insurance affect the question of whether the disputed clause is an indemnity.

When I first read the words they seemed to me a clear expression of intention that when the driver is using or working the plant under the direction and supervision of the hirer, as McManus was in this case, the hirer shall be responsible for the driver's action (including, of course, his negligence) as though the driver were in his direct employ. In such a case the hirer, who is making use of his services, will be vicariously liable for them as a master is. I still think that that is its clear meaning. Any other reading of the clause is straining its meaning. This is an ordinary business document meant to be intelligible to businessmen; it is not an artistic document, and I think it has only one normal construction. That construction is consistent with the intention of the parties as collected from the whole agreement.

If it means what I understand it to mean, does it constitute an indemnity? In Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Coggins,[1] the facts were not dissimilar to the present case. The Harbour Board, who hired out cranes with drivers, laid down regulations that were binding on applicants for the use of such cranes. They provided that the drivers provided with the cranes "shall be the servants of the applicants." The issue in that case was whether this contractual condition could affect the Board's liability to a plaintiff who was injured, and it was held that it could not; but Lord Porter pointed out[2]: "A "contract of this kind may of course determine the liability of "the employers inter se, but it has only an indirect bearing "upon the question which of them is to be regarded as master "of the workman on a particular occasion."

In my view the contested clause does determine the liability of the employers inter se, and the second defendants are entitled to the indemnity they claim.

[1954 W. No. 3659.]

Practice and Procedure—Stay of proceedings—Bill before Parliament affecting issues—Court not concerned with pending legislation—Stay refused.

Parliament — Pending legislation — Bill before Parliament affecting issues.

The court will not take into consideration the effect of possible future legislation which, if passed in its present form, would affect the rights now in issue between the parties.

The plaintiffs, a canal carrying company, sued the British Transport Commission for breach of their statutory duties to keep open and navigable the Kennet and Avon Canal, which was vested in the commission. The commission admitted the breaches of duty, but asked for a stay of the proceedings (except insofar as they concerned an inquiry as to damages), on the ground that a Bill then before Parliament would, if passed in its existing form, relieve them of their statutory duties.

Held, that a plaintiff was entitled in the ordinary course of events to have his case tried, and that it would not be just to stay an action on the ground that there was a Bill before Parliament which, when passed, might affect the rights of the parties.

PROCEDURE SUMMONS.

The defendants, the British Transport Commission, applied to stay an action brought against them by the plaintiffs, the Willow Wren Canal Carrying Co. Ltd., except for the purposes of an inquiry as to damages, until the defendants' Bill, 4 & 5 Eliz. 2, British Transport Commission (No. 2), which was before Parliament, had received the Royal Assent, with such amendments (if any) as might be made.

The nature of the action was as follows: The business of the plaintiff company was to operate vessels on canals in England for the purpose of carrying merchandise by water from one part of England to another. The canal here in question was the Kennet and Avon Canal, which was constructed under a number of Acts some 150 years ago, and ultimately vested in the Great Western Railway Company under the Great Western Railway Act, 1852 (No. 1). By section 27 of that Act and by section 17 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, the company became bound to keep the canal and every part thereof at all times open and navigable.

Under the Transport Act, 1947, which came into force on January 1, 1948, the canal became vested in the defendants, the British Transport Commission, on the terms and obligations in which it had previously vested in the Great Western Railway Company.

The plaintiffs had asked the defendants to quote tolls for certain merchandise which they wished to carry along the canal from Reading to Bristol. The defendants had refused to give quotations.

The plaintiffs alleged that the canal was now not in a fit condition and was in fact incapable of bearing traffic, and that allegation was admitted by the defendants. The plaintiffs contended that this was not a misfortune of the defendants at all, but that the unfitness of the canal was the result of a deliberate process of neglect on their part; and that it was done with the object of preventing access to the canal as part of a scheme to discourage traffic on it so as to ensure that the canal would deteriorate through lack of use in order that they could then purport to justify the abandonment of the canal on the ground that it was not being used for the purposes of navigation, and that to restore it to good order would involve the expenditure of sums of money incommensurate with the financial return.

The plaintiffs alleged that the defendants had refused to comply with their statutory duties regarding the canal and had no intention of doing so unless compelled by an order of the court, and that they intended unless restrained by an order of the court to close and abandon the canal.

The plaintiffs claimed a declaration that the defendants were bound to keep and maintain the canal in good order and condition and asked for an injunction to restrain them from obstructing any part of the canal, from closing the canal, from failing to maintain a proper depth of water in the canal and from causing or permitting the canal to be and remain impassable.

The defendants' case was that the canal was admittedly unnavigable and that the defendants had not complied and were not complying with their statutory obligations; that they were willing to pay damages, and to submit to an inquiry as to the amount of such damages.

The defendants, however, denied that there had been any wilful default upon their part to maintain the canal, and they pleaded that the canal had been for over fifty years in some parts unnavigable, that the various ways in which it was alleged that the canal was out of repair were due to no fault or neglect of the Transport Commission.

Cases cited in argument and not referred to in the judgment: In re Yates' Settlement Trusts [1]; In re J. B. Palmer's application. [2]

UPJOHN J. having stated the facts continued: The defendants say that they are awaiting the passing of a Bill in Parliament, the effect of which they hope will be to relieve them from their statutory obligations, and therefore they submit that it is right that this action should be stayed, not permanently, but until the fate of that Bill in Parliament was known.

The writ in this action was issued on November 9, 1954; and it was somewhat faintly suggested that the action was intended to embarrass the Transport Commission in regard to their Bill for relief from their statutory duties. The dates do not bear that out, for the Bill was in fact deposited a year after the action had been started, and indeed more than six months after the defence in its original form had been delivered.

It is said that if this action comes on, much expense will be incurred, which will be thrown away, if the Bill goes through in the form in which its sponsors, the defendants, hope that it will go through. The pleadings are closed; discovery has been had; I do not know that it is yet finished, but it is said that the action would normally be fit for hearing in March or April of this year. I have no doubt that the action will be of a very heavy nature and will take many days to hear. The pleadings are of a most detailed character; I have given only a very brief outline of them and the particulars are very voluminous. Experts will no doubt be employed, and there is likely to be a great deal of correspondence, and I accept at once that it will be a most expensive action to try.

It is said that at the end of that action a judge would be bound to suspend an injunction, if he thought that the plaintiffs had established their right to one, until the fate of the Bill is known; the proper course is, therefore, to stay this action until the result of the Bill be known.

A preliminary objection is taken to that, which is fatal to that application; and it is that, sitting in this court, it is my duty to see that litigants have their cases tried, as they are entitled to, and that I cannot take into account the possible effect of some Bill now before Parliament which, if passed into law in its present form, may have some effect upon the rights of the parties. That seems to me to be a correct formulation of the law. This court is not concerned with what Parliament may think it wise to do in relation to the rights of the parties, but the plaintiffs are entitled to come to this court and say, "In the "normal course of events our action will very soon be ripe for "hearing. We desire that the court should hear it."

Of course, if subsequently to that Parliament in its wisdom by some enactment affects the rights of the parties even to the extent of modifying or abrogating the effects of any judgment which the plaintiffs may be fortunate enough to obtain, no one doubts the right and power of Parliament to do so. But it is plain that it is not right for this court either now or at the hearing to take into account the possible effect of some Bill at present before Parliament which, so far as this court is concerned, may never be passed into law at all, or, if passed into law, may ultimately contain provisions which do not affect the rights of the parties before the court at all. In other words, it is a matter of speculation on which this court will not embark as to whether a Bill at present before Parliament will be passed into law in its present form.

Authority is not wanting for that proposition. In Attorney-General v. Racecourse Betting Control Board [1] a question arose with regard to the powers of the Racecourse Betting Control Board to make payments and so forth. It was held by Eve J. that certain payments which they had made were ultra vires, and that decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. At the conclusion of the hearing before the Court of Appeal the appellants, who had only been partly successful, asked for leave to appeal, and upon that matter Mr. Gavin Simonds, who appeared for the Racecourse Betting Control Board, said this [2]: "Upon "the question of appeal your Lordships may be aware that "there is now before the House of Commons a Bill, which has "already passed your Lordship's House [that, of course, was "referring to Lord Hanworth, then presiding in the Court of "Appeal], and is now in Committee in the House of Commons, "and I understand it is going to be taken immediately on the "floor of the whole House, which provides . . ." and he then read out the provisions of the Bill, and continued: "It is "interesting to observe that that exactly agrees with your Lord-"ships' judgment, legalising that which your Lordships have "held to be lawful, and I think not covering the payment which "your Lordships have held not to be lawful. With that Bill in "the state in which it is, I venture to submit to your Lordships "that it is not a case in which leave to appeal to the House of "Lords should be given, putting us to further expense." Lord Hanworth said [2]: "But, Mr. Gavin Simonds, I think you are "imputing to me cognisance, or at any rate knowledge, which, "seated here, I do not possess. The position here is that my "colleagues and I are seated here as a Court of Appeal. Does "not the point which you raise go to the question of whether "it would be wise, or whether it would be worth while, for the " appellants to proceed with their appeal? They might be " minded to appeal, and if that clause were, for example, struck " out, they might wish to go on. On the other hand, if it was " incorporated in a Bill which received the Royal Assent, they " might desire not to go on with the appeal." Then Sir Stafford Cripps said [3]: " Quite obviously, if that provision passed into an " Act of Parliament there would be no point in anyone pro- " ceeding with an appeal; but there are many slips between " cup and the lip, and that clause may never be passed into an " Act of Parliament. Therefore, we do desire to have leave to " appeal in case it is necessary." Lord Hanworth said [3]: " I " think that is right," and leave to appeal was given.

That was, of course, a different case, but it illustrates very well the principle which the court adopts in these circumstances. There is the more recent case of British and Colonial Furniture Co. Ltd. v. William McIlroy Ltd.,[4] which came before the Court of Appeal on an interlocutory application. That was a case under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, in which the court was asked to make an interim order under section 5 (13) of that Act, authorizing the tenants to stay in possession of the premises pending completion of proceedings taken for grant of a new lease. That again was, of course, quite a different case, but Jenkins L.J. said [5], " Counsel for the tenants say, however, that " in these two cases the orders ought to have been made because " certain pending legislation, namely, the Leasehold Property " (Temporary Provisions) Bill, if, and when, it comes into force, " and providing it comes into force in the form in which the Bill " now stands, will give some advantage to a tenant in occupation " under an interim order which would be denied to a tenant who " is in possession under an undertaking given to the court in lieu " of an actual order under subsection (13). To demonstrate " that this pending legislation would, or might have, that effect " we were invited to look at and to construe the print of the " Bill. We refused to do that. In my judgment, it is contrary " to all principles that we should decide these two cases not " simply on matters relevant to the particular landlord and " tenant legislation as it stands, but by reference to possible " alterations in the law which may be made under legislation " yet to be passed." That also illustrates this principle.

I cannot, therefore, possibly grant this application, and the plaintiffs are entitled to have their action heard in the ordinary course of events Without prejudice to the point which I have already considered, I was invited to and did look at the Bill. I do not propose to review it in any detail, but when it is seen that the principal object of that Bill, should it go through Parliament in its present form, is to prevent this action from ever coming to trial at all, and that is one of its admitted objects, it would be a grave injustice if I were to prevent the plaintiffs from obtaining from this court a judgment to which they may on the facts be entitled. If I stand this action over until the fate of the Bill be known and the Bill is passed by Parliament, this action could never come to trial.

The only other observation that I would make on the Bill is that it shows how sound is the rule of this court that it will not look at possible future legislation. During the course of argument much time has been taken up with a discussion as to the meaning of some obscure phrases in the Bill, and what their precise effect will be on the plaintiffs if they succeed. That shows that it is useless speculation to look at a Bill and try to formulate or guess what Parliament is going to do in the future.

No harm will be done to the defendants by the action proceeding. Parliament in its wisdom can put such provisions into the Act dealing with any judgment that the plaintiffs may obtain if it thinks proper so to do.

I therefore refuse this application, and I shall order that the costs thereof be paid by the defendants in any event.

Application dismissed; leave to appeal refused.

*DYER v. ILFRACOMBE URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL.

[1954 D. No. 39.]

Licensor and Licensee—Child—Unaccompanied by adult—Public recreation ground—Child injured by fall from chute—No concealed danger—Liability of authority.

A boy four and a half years old fell from the platform of a chute in a public recreation ground provided by the defendant council. He was unaccompanied by an adult in the recreation ground. The chute which was properly constructed, installed and maintained, was 12 feet high, with steps leading up one side and a slide down at the other, with a double line of rails along either side of the steps and also along the platform at the top. The boy was seen by another boy to fall between the upper and lower rails, but the reason for his fall was unexplained. In an action brought by his next friend he was awarded damages by the trial judge, who held that he was a licensee and that the council had been guilty of negligence and had failed in their duty as licensors. On appeal by the defendants:—

Held, that the chute being properly constructed, installed and maintained, and there being no concealed trap or danger which would not be obvious to a boy of the plaintiff's age, the defendants could not be said to have been negligent or to have failed to perform their duty as licensors, and the appeal must be allowed.

Per Singleton L.J. It is in the public interest that recreational facilities and amenities should be provided, and in the case of small recreation grounds it is not the duty of the local authority to provide a groundsman, keeper or nurse, or to put up notices to warn young children. The parents still had some responsibility for their children's safety.

APPEAL from Pilcher J., sitting at Exeter Assizes.

The plaintiff, David Dyer, a boy, by his next friend, sued the defendants, the Ilfracombe Urban District Council, for damages for personal injuries which, it was alleged, were caused through the defendants' negligence. The council had for some years maintained a recreation ground in which they had placed a chute by which children could ascend steps to a height of 12 feet and then slide down on the other side, where, in the ordinary course, they came safely to rest upon their feet. No accident had happened upon it and no complaint had been made. Prior to the Coronation in 1953 the council decided to increase the number of the recreation grounds within their district, believing it to be in the best interests of the inhabitants and hoping that it would encourage children to go to them rather than to play on the roads and streets. They therefore made two or three more recreation grounds and installed a chute in each of them. Each chute had two lines of rails all the way up the steps and round the platform.

On June 26, 1953, the plaintiff, who was then four and a half years old, fell from the platform of the chute in the Slade Lane recreation ground and broke his arm. He was unaccompanied by an adult. There was no precise evidence of how the accident happened, but it appeared that in some way or other he got to the top of the chute, onto the platform, and climbed or fell between the lower and the upper rail and was seen to fall to the ground.

Pilcher J. held that the defendants had failed in their duty to the plaintiff, who was their licensee, and he awarded £100 damages to the boy and £12 out-of-pocket expenses to his mother.

The defendants appealed.

Neil Lawson Q.C. and M. D. Van Oss for the defendants.
Malcolm Wright Q.C. and Thomas Dewar for the plaintiff.

Dyer
v.
Ilfracombe
Urban District Council.

Singleton L.J. having stated the facts continued: There was little evidence given on behalf of the plaintiff. The mother of the boy gave evidence, mostly as to the boy's condition and as to his age. She was not asked whether she allowed the boy to go to the recreation ground nearby or whether she had warned him to be careful, or not to use any of the swings or other things provided for entertainment unless he had someone older with him. The boy was not called, and it is that which perhaps makes one say that no one knows precisely what happened. I am not suggesting that he ought to have been sworn of necessity. But if he had been asked he might quite well have been able to say what happened. Suffice it to say that he fell from the platform to the ground and he broke his arm.

On behalf of the defendants there was called only one witness, Mr. Jemmett, the chairman of the council, who said that the members of the council were anxious to increase the number of recreation grounds. I think that he said there had been a petition in regard to those matters, and the council accordingly made more recreation grounds and took advice as to what was the best form of chute for them to have. I suppose that everyone is familiar with a chute, and I suppose that everyone knows the kind of age of those who are meant to use a chute such as the one with which we are dealing: not babes in arms, nor yet grown persons.

The boy appears to have been by himself. There were other boys near by. The witness for the plaintiff, Terence Moss, said that there were other children going up the steps of the chute when the boy Dyer was at the top. But no one saw any jostling or pushing, or anything of that kind. The boy fell for no reason that can be given. There is nothing to show whether he had been up the chute before or not; no information whatever.

Pilcher J. was obviously impressed by some evidence given by Mr. Jemmett, the chairman of the council, who was asked by the judge: "Did it strike you that the accident might have been "caused because the child was too young to play on a thing "like this? (A) It struck me perhaps that the child was too young "to be there unaccompanied. (Q) But you did not put any "notice about that up? (A) No, because obviously the child "could not read it under five years old. (Mr. Dewar): No notice "or regulations of any kind saying: 'Parents are advised not "'to let children under five use this apparatus' were put up? "(A) No." Then he was referred to a photograph, and was asked by counsel: "Are you a parent? (A) Yes. (Q) Would you "let one of your toddlers go there and climb up there without "anybody there? (A) What age would you call a toddler? "(Q) 4 years. (A) My sons have been on there since they were "4. (Q) You take the view that you would let your children, "even though you were not there, to climb up there when they "were 4 years of age? (A) I said if I were there I would permit "them to do it." Then the judge asked: "Would you allow a " child of 4 to go and climb on this thing unaccompanied by a " responsible adult? (A) No. (Q) Why not—because it is not " safe? (A) No, I do not agree. (Q) Then why? (A) Because " they do not appreciate always that the way to approach this " thing is up the steps in a proper manner. (Q) They may hurt " themselves? (A) They may misuse it. (Q) Are you afraid of " a 4-year-old damaging your slide? (A) No, I am suggesting " they may misuse it other than as a chute. (Q) Because they " may hurt themselves, is that what you say? They are not " going to hurt the chute? (A) No. (Q) Is it because they may " hurt themselves? (A) Yes." The judge, having referred to those answers, said in the course of his judgment: " That " qualification was, I think, added because it had been suggested " that if a child, even of four and a half years, bravely walked " up the steps of the chute, on to the platform and sat down on " the chute, it was unlikely that it would come to any harm, " and with that I wholeheartedly agree. But, unfortunately, " unattended children of four and a half years do not act in that " fashion; they do not perceive the dangers of playing, perhaps " swinging on the little guard rails provided, and it does not " want much of a push or jostle to cause a small body to go " through these rails, as happened in this case. That, no doubt, " is the reason why Mr. Jemmett said what he did. Mr. " Jemmett expressed a view which entirely coincides with my " own." Pilcher J. added: " As I said at an early stage in the " case, whilst this was no doubt a very excellently constructed " chute, the only point in the case was whether any condition " ought to have been applied to the licence regarding the use " of this chute by very small children. I do not propose to lay " down any age below which some conditions should be attached " to the licence granted to children to use this chute, but I am " satisfied that the chute was not safe for the use of an " unattended, small child of the infant plaintiff's age; and in face " of what Mr. Jemmett said in the witness-box, I find it quite " impossible to say that Mr. Jemmett did not appreciate that, " because he quite clearly did."

The judge found that the chute was brought from experienced manufacturers; that it was of excellent design; that it was of a perfectly sound construction, and that it was properly installed. Mr. Malcolm Wright on behalf of the plaintiff added that the judge found that the chute was not safe for an unattended small child, and that the defendants knew that.

A question of law arises which has been discussed in the courts frequently. It is agreed on both sides that the boy who was hurt was a licensee and that he had all the rights of one who was permitted by the defendants to go on their recreation ground. The duty towards a licensee is that the occupier (the defendants in this case) must warn him of any concealed danger or trap of which the occupier knows.

One question for consideration is: Is there a distinction for this purpose between the case of a grown licensee and one who is quite young? May there be a danger which is not a concealed danger in the ordinary sense, but which ought to be regarded as a concealed danger if the licensee is of tender years? That question was considered by Devlin J. lately in Phipps v. Rochester Corporation [1] where the judge reviewed the authorities, and towards the end of his judgment said: "A licensor who "tacitly permits the public to use his land without discriminating "between its members must assume that the public may include "little children. But as a general rule he will have discharged "his duty towards them if the dangers which they may encounter "are only those which are obvious to a guardian or of which he "has given a warning comprehensible by a guardian. To every "general rule there are, of course, exceptions. A licensor "cannot divest himself of the obligation of finding out something "about the sort of people who are availing themselves of his "permission and the sort of use they are making of it. He may "have to take into account the social habits of the neighbour-"hood. No doubt there are places where little children go to "play unaccompanied. If the licensor knows or ought to "anticipate that, he may have to take steps accordingly. But "the responsibility for the safety of little children must rest "primarily upon the parents; it is their duty to see that such "children are not allowed to wander about by themselves, or "at the least to satisfy themselves that the places to which they "do allow their children to go unaccompanied are safe for them "to go to. It would not be socially desirable if parents were, "as a matter of course, able to shift the burden of looking after "their children from their own shoulders to those of persons "who happen to have accessible bits of land. Different con-"siderations may well apply to public parks or to recognized "playing grounds where parents allow their children to go "unaccompanied in the reasonable belief that they are safe." When Mr. Malcolm Wright cited those words of Devlin J., it occurred to me to ask: "How is one to judge whether this is "a case in which the parents allowed the child to go unaccom-"panied in the reasonable belief that he would be safe, if there "was not one question asked of the mother by counsel who "called her or by counsel on the other side, and the boy was "not called?" Whether the mother had given the boy any instructions or whether she had any belief that the place was safe, I do not know. I should think it is quite likely that he had been there regularly since the place was opened, but I do not know.

It has generally been recognised that there are three classes—invitees, licensees and trespassers. Some parts of the judgment of Devlin J. would appear to point to a view that licensees may be divided up into licensees of age and licensees of tender years.

[1] [1955] 1 Q.B. 450, 472; [1955] 1 All E.R. 250.

It does not appear to be necessary to consider that in the present case, for on either view it seems to me that upon the facts the plaintiff ought not to succeed.

A boy four and a half years old who strikes a bigger boy knows what may come to him. A boy of that age knows that if he falls from a height he is likely to hurt himself: he knows that if he falls into deep water he may be drowned. He is old enough to appreciate those things. Children do fall about. Sometimes when one falls he cries. Why? Because he is hurt. He does not like it. That is something which occurs very early in his life. I refer to that because of the expressions in various authorities, to which I shall refer, such as "concealed danger" or "trap." If a boy of that age goes up the steps to a platform at the top of a chute and looks around him, he knows that if he falls he will be hurt. He knew that before he went up. He is old enough to know why the handrails are put there.

A case to which reference is often made is Latham v. R. Johnson & Nephew Ltd.[2] in which the defendants were owners of a plot of unfenced land from which some houses had been cleared. It was accessible by a path leading from the back of the house in which the plaintiff, a child between two and three years old, lived with her parents. The public were allowed by the defendants to traverse the land, and children of all ages were in the habit of playing upon heaps of sand, stone, and other materials which from time to time were deposited there by the defendants. The plaintiff went upon the land unaccompanied by any older person and was shortly afterwards found upon a heap of paving stones, one of which had fallen upon her hand and injured it. There was no evidence to show how the accident happened. In an action for negligence the jury found that children played upon the land with the knowledge and permission of the defendants; that there was no invitation to the plaintiff to use the land unaccompanied; that the defendants ought to have known that there was a likelihood of children being injured by the stones; and that the defendants did not take reasonable care to prevent children being injured thereby. Upon these findings Scrutton J. held that the case came within Cooke v. Midland Great Western Railway of Ireland[3] and gave judgment for the plaintiff with damages. On appeal it was held: "that, "there being neither allurement nor trap, nor invitation, nor "dangerous object placed upon the land, the defendants were "not liable," and the judgment was set aside. Farwell L.J. said[4]: "Now the law as to mere licensees is well settled. The "grant of the licence to go on the land creates no right, but "merely affords an answer to a charge of trespass: Bolch v. "Smith.[5] It is a mere permission, and those who take it must "take it with all chances of meeting with accidents." He added [6]: "I am not aware of any case that imposes any greater "liability on the owner towards children than towards adults: "the exceptions apply to all alike and the adult is as much "entitled to protection as the child. If the child is too young "to understand danger, the licence ought not to be held to "extend to such a child unless accompanied by a competent "guardian." Hamilton L.J. said [7]: "The rule as to licensees, "too, is that they must take the premises as they find them, apart "from concealed sources of danger; where dangers are obvious "they run the risk of them." He added [8]: "Two other terms "must be alluded to—a 'trap' and 'attraction' or 'allurement.' "A trap is a figure of speech, not a formula. It involves the "idea of concealment and surprise of an appearance of safety "under circumstances cloaking a reality of danger. Owners and "occupiers alike expose licensees and visitors to traps on their "premises at their peril, but a trap is a relative term. In the "case of an infant, there are moral as well as physical traps. "There may accordingly be a duty towards infants not merely "not to dig pitfalls for them, but not to lead them into tempta-"tion. . . . Finally, what objects which attract infants to their "hurt are traps even to them? Not all objects with which "children hurt themselves simpliciter. A child can get into "mischief and hurt itself with anything if it is young enough. "In some cases the answer may rest with the jury, but it must "be matter of law to say whether a given object can be a trap "in the double sense of being fascinating and fatal. No strict "answer has been, or perhaps ever will be, given to the question, "but I am convinced that a heap of paving stones in broad "daylight in a private close cannot so combine the properties of "temptation and retribution as to be properly called a trap."

I come to two judgments of Scrutton L.J. The first, in March, 1934, is in Purkis v. Walthamstow Borough Council.[9] In that case a boy just over the age of twelve years entered a recreation ground provided by the defendant local authority "for "the use of children under twelve years only." He fell off a swing and was injured by the swing in motion hitting him twice before he could get away. In an action against the defendants he was awarded damages for these personal injuries on the ground that there being approximately two hundred children in the recreation ground and but one attendant provided by the defendants, the plaintiff's injuries were the result of lack of adequate supervision on the part of the defendants, and judgment was entered for him. The defendants did not contend that the plaintiff was a trespasser in the recreation ground. On appeal, judgment was entered for the defendants on the ground that the plaintiff's fall from the swing, as appeared from the evidence, was due to his sickness and fainting and that there was no evidence on which the jury could find that the plaintiff's injuries were due to lack of supervision on the part of the defendants. Scrutton L.J. said [10]: "Taking this view, I do not think it "necessary to essay a complete exposition of the liability of local "authorities who provide recreation grounds, including play-"grounds for children. I have stated to the best of my ability "the grades of variety from trespassers to invitees for payment "in Hayward v. Drury Lane Theatre,[11] and Hamilton L.J. did "the same in Latham v. Johnson.[12] It is not easy to decide "in the case of a local authority providing a recreation ground "whether it licenses or invites. It has a power, but not a duty, "to provide, and may regulate by attendants and by-laws. The "cases appear to show that the authority is not liable for the "consequences of dangers obvious to children. It is not liable "if a child, even of four-and-a-half-years tumbles into either "natural or artificial water: see Hastie v. Edinburgh Magis-"trates [13] and Stevenson v. Glasgow Corporation.[14] The "authority is liable if it provides 'traps' accessible to children, "such as shrubs with attractive but poisonous berries: Glasgow "Corporation v. Taylor [15]). It would be liable for defective or "dangerous premises or implements for play. But, in my "opinion, the authority which has provided unobjectionable "structures or implements for play is under no duty to super-"vise their employment, still less to ascertain that each child "using them is physically fit to stand a swinging or revolving "motion."

In Liddle v. Yorkshire (North Riding) County Council,[16] a case in which a little boy fell off a wall, he having got upon the wall by means of a heap of stones which the defendants, the local authority, had put there, Scrutton L.J. said [17]: "In my opinion, "to make the landowner liable for injury to a child on his land, "it must be proved that he expressly or impliedly invited "children on to his land, and either did an act which caused "damage with knowledge that it might injure the children, or "knowingly permitted the existence on his land of a hidden "danger or trap. The invitation might be implied from know-"ledge that children frequented the land without interference. "For obvious dangers, such as unguarded water, natural or "artificial, he will not be liable."

I see no distinction in principle between the case of the chute in the recreation ground and an artificial lake or water in a recreation ground. Neither can properly be regarded as a concealed danger to a boy four and a half years old.

Again, Donovan v. Union Cartage Co. Ltd.,[18] shows the view of the Divisional Court, consisting of Acton J. and Talbot J., on the case of the unhorsed van belonging to the defendants left by them unattended in a public street outside their premises. The younger plaintiff, an infant, aged seven years, while playing in the street with other children, climbed on to the van, fell and was injured. It was held "that the defendants, the owners of "the van, were not liable, because (1) there was no inherent "danger in a sound, stationary and immobile vehicle, left "unattended in the street." Acton J. said [19]: "There is, how-"ever, a distinction between these cases and the present case, "which, in our opinion, is a valid distinction, and, as indicated "by Lord Atkinson, it is supported by authority. The cases in "which it has been held that liability arises appear to have one "common feature—namely, that the object left unattended and "accessible to children, and likely to be an allurement to them, "possessed some attribute which rendered it dangerous in itself, "and it was in consequence of its possession of this attribute "that the accident happened and the injury ensued. It may be "that the object is dangerous through being actually in motion, "or liable to be easily set in motion, or poisonous or deleterious "to eat or handle, or explosive, or so defective in some way as to "be inherently dangerous. There is, in our judgment, no such "element of inherent danger in a sound, stationary and immobile "vehicle, such as the van in the present case. To extend the "principle of Lynch v. Nurdin [20] to things in no way dangerous "in themselves, left unattended in a street (or in other places "open to the public, such as parks, pleasure grounds, or open "spaces), would be to impose burdens of responsibility so far-"reaching and incalculable as to be unreasonable and intolerable. "It cannot be said that, even if such things are likely to attract "children, there is in them anything in the nature of a trap or a "concealed peril." In that case the infant was able to climb up on to an unattended van left in the street. I suppose that some-one might have said that he did not appreciate that it was dangerous. True, he was seven years old. But it is the measure of duty stated by Acton J. to which I refer. The principles stated in that case cover the case before this court.

More recently, there has been Bates v. Stone Parish Council,[21] on which the plaintiff's counsel places great reliance. It is right that I should read the headnote (in the Law Reports) to make clear the facts of that case. "The plaintiff, then three "and a half years of age, was permitted by his mother to go to "the children's playground in a recreation ground provided by "the local parish council, accompanied only by another child of "six years. In the playground was provided a chute or slide, "the use of which necessitated ascending stairs to a platform "which was about 12 feet from the ground. After making "several descents with the other child the plaintiff went up by "himself and while sitting on the platform fell through a space

" some 13½ inches square between the upright and horizontal " rails on the side of the platform, suffering injuries which " resulted in permanent blindness. Some thirteen years pre- " viously a boy of four years had fallen from the platform when " the rails were in the same condition. Additional rails had then " been added as a measure of safety, but in the interval the " additional rails had either rusted or broken away and had not " been replaced. At the trial of the action the jury found that " the plaintiff was a licensee and that the council, having know- " ledge of the danger, was liable. They awarded the plaintiff " £17,500 damages. On appeal the council contended that the " licence to use the playground did not apply to very young " children unless accompanied by a competent guardian; that " the plaintiff was in the circumstances a trespasser and the " council was not liable. Held, that although, in certain circum- " stances, a licence to young children to enter on property on " which there is a source of potential danger is assumed to be " conditional on their being accompanied by a competent guar- " dian, in the present case it was clear from the council's own " evidence that no restriction had been placed on the admission " to the playground of children, however young and whether " accompanied or not; that the plaintiff entered the playground " as a licensee and did not become a trespasser when he went on " to the chute; and that the council knowing of the dangerous " quality of the aperture through which the plaintiff fell were " liable in damages." There were a number of questions put to the jury in order to ascertain first whether the boy was a licensee or a trespasser. Upon the jury's answers it was clear that he was to be treated as a licensee. Much of the discussion in the Court of Appeal was on that subject, coupled with the fact that there had been a previous accident upon the same chute after which the parish council had put up new rails which in turn came into disrepair before the accident to the plaintiff. And it was contended that the direction given to the jury by Cassels J. was faulty. The appeal failed, except as to the amount of damages. It is interesting to notice question No. 6 and the answer thereto. It was: " If the answers to 4 and 5 [whether " the slide was dangerous equipment and whether the plaintiff " was allured by it] are ' Yes,' was the slide a danger to the " infant plaintiff which he would not appreciate? " and the jury answered " Yes." It does not appear that the question " Was " this a concealed danger or trap? " was put. Nor does it appear from the report that that question was argued. The arguments of counsel are not set out. The boy Bates was only three and a half years old. The judgments deal chiefly with the question of the alleged misdirection, but Romer L.J. said [22]: " On the question of liability I only desire to say in conclusion

" that had it not been for the accident in 1934 and the defendants' knowledge, or presumed knowledge of it, the plaintiff " would, in my judgment, have had no ground of action. The " evidence shows that the possibility of an accident happening " such as that which unfortunately did occur would not have " presented itself to the mind of any reasonably prudent person " who was unaware of the previous mishap. And it would, in " the long run, be disadvantageous in the extreme to the public " and to children in general if such a person, or body " of persons, were to be held liable for an accident of so " improbable and unforeseeable a nature as that which befell " the plaintiff; for the prospect of being sued for heavy " damages (insurable, perhaps, but only at considerable cost) " would in all probability result in the disappearance altogether of amenities which many local authorities and private " persons voluntarily provide for the entertainment and amusement of children. 'It is impossible,' said Farwell L.J. in " Latham's case.[23] ' to hold the defendants liable unless we are " ' prepared to say that they are bound to employ a ground- " ' keeper to look after the safety of their licensees, and the " ' result of such a finding would be disastrous, for it would " ' drive all landowners to discontinue the kindly treatment so " ' largely extended to children and others all over the country.' " Romer L.J. added: " That which the Lord Justice envisaged " as disastrous in 1913 would at least be equally so to-day when " the dangers of the streets, which in many cases would become " the substitutes for playgrounds, considerably exceed such perils " as exist in chutes and swings." I agree with the Lord Justice.

More and more as the years go on local authorities are encouraged to extend recreational facilities and amenities, and they do so. It is in the interest of the people. In the ordinary case of a small recreation ground such as this it is not their duty to provide a groundsman or keeper. If they did, they would have to provide two or three in the summer, for daylight lasts a long time. Nor do I think it is their duty to put up notices: " Children under " five "—or whatever the age may be—" not permitted upon the " chutes or swings." If they did so children would not take much notice, and if an accident happened it would be said: " What is the good of their putting up notices unless you see " that they are observed? " Nor is it the duty of the local authority to provide nurses for young children who go to recreation grounds. The parents of young children still have some responsibility.

There was no trap. There was no concealed danger. There was nothing which was not obvious to a child four and a half years old. My view of this case is that the danger (if that is the correct term) was the ordinary danger which is present to the mind of anyone if he or she climbs to a height. For these reasons, it appears to me that the appeal should be allowed, and that the judgment of Pilcher J. should be set aside.

JENKINS L.J. I agree, and there is very little I can usefully add, but I might perhaps cite some passages from Sutton v. Bootle Corporation,[24] to which the judge referred in his judgment. That was a case of a girl of nine years of age who was injured in a children's playground while endeavouring to stop a swing. She was dragged off her legs and in attempting to save herself sustained an injury to one of her fingers. Stable J. held that the finger was caught and crushed between the unguarded lug and socket of a checking device designed to prevent the swing from going too far. The swing had been supplied to the corporation by a firm of repute who had supplied a very large number of such appliances all over the country and in connection with which no similar accident had happened. The corporation had no knowledge of the alleged defect in the swing. The judge decided in favour of the plaintiff and awarded her damages, but on appeal to this court it was held that the defendant corporation owed the plaintiff only the obligation of a licensor to a licensee; that as licensors they were under a duty to do no more than warn the plaintiff of dangers actually known to them; and that as they had no knowledge of any danger they were under no liability. The basis of the judge's decision appears from this passage in the Law Reports.[25] "He"—that is the judge—"held that the plaintiff was a licensee, and that the defendants "had no knowledge of the danger, but on the ground that it "was the duty of a local authority which provided implements "for children to play with in a public recreation ground main-"tained by them, to provide safe and proper implements so far "as care and skill could do so, he awarded the plaintiff damages." He was thus placing visitors to a recreation ground such as the ground in the present case in a better position, and the occupiers of such a ground in a more onerous position, than that ordinarily obtaining as between licensor and licensee. On appeal to this court that view was held to be erroneous, and the appeal was allowed. Asquith L.J. discussed the law at considerable length and said[26]: "The suggestion that persons entering on publicly "or municipally-owned parks or recreation grounds enjoy a "special privileged status superior to that of licensees would seem "to be ill founded. Text-book authority is opposed to the exist-"ence of such a separate class. (See Salmond on Torts, 10th ed., "pp. 485–487, Winfield, 2nd ed., pp. 616–620.) As to the "authorities, Robert Addie & Sons (Collieries) v. Dumbreck[27] "appears to decide that persons entering on premises in the "occupation of others (otherwise than under a contract) are "classifiable exhaustively as either trespassers, licensees, or

"invitees, and that there are no intermediate or hybrid classes, "such as that envisaged by Maugham L.J., as he then was, in "Purkis v. Walthamstow Borough Council.[28] Coates v. Raw- "tenstall Corporation[29] is a direct decision of this court that a "municipal authority owning or occupying a recreation ground— "in that case as in this, supplying thereon swings for children— "is a licensor and not an invitor. I know of no decision of the "Court of Appeal deciding the contrary." Later in his judgment, Asquith L.J. went on to consider a further ground on which it was alleged that the duty owed by the corporation in that case to the plaintiff was higher than that owed by a licensor to a licensee. He said[30]: "Before, however, passing to the issue of "knowledge . . . I must briefly deal with the issue raised by "the word 'allurement'—the other factor relied on as raising the "obligations of the defendants to a higher level than that of "licensors. The presence of this element, which is of course "only relevant when the entrant on the defendant's premises is "a child, would seem, where it exists, to affect the occupier's "duty to this extent, that a danger which is patent to an adult "may not be apparent to a child; to a child it may be a concealed "trap; accordingly that a warning or other preventive measure "may be called for in the case of a child, when it would not be "called for in the case of an adult, or a warning of a more "emphatic or coercive character than would suffice in the case "of an adult. What objects are and what are not in law "'allurements'? An exhaustive catalogue has not been laid "down. Turntables, escalators and paddling pools have been "held to 'allure.' Rivers, ponds and piles of paving stones have "been held 'insufficiently seductive.'" Then he goes on: "Clerk and Lindsell on Torts, 10th ed., pp. 545–546, place "swings in the unalluring class, citing as authority Ellis v. "Fulham Borough Council.[31] If this classification is right it "disposes of this branch of the argument. But I doubt if the "case goes so far. If a swing or this swing is an allurement it "is sufficient to say that no case would appear to exist in which "a plaintiff relying on allurement has succeeded, save where "there was actual knowledge by the defendants that the alluring "object was dangerous." After some further citations, he concludes that part of his judgment: "It would seem, then, that "the plaintiff was a mere licensee."

Accordingly, as it seems to me, the present case resolves itself into this. Was there a trap or concealed danger in this chute and if so was it known to the defendant council? Even if it would be right to treat the chute as an allurement, and accordingly judge from the standpoint of a child the question whether any danger there may have been was in the nature of a trap or concealed danger, in my view, any such danger in order to be relevant here must be a danger of the kind referred to in the passage quoted by my Lord from the judgment of Acton J. in Donovan v. Union Cartage Co., Ltd.[32] In that passage the judge said: "The cases in which it has been held that liability "arises appear to have one common feature—namely, that the "object left unattended and accessible to children, and likely to "be an allurement to them, possessed some attribute which "rendered it dangerous in itself, and it was in consequence of "its possession of the attribute that the accident happened and "the injury ensued. It may be that the object is dangerous "through being actually in motion, or liable to be easily set in "motion, or poisonous or deleterious to eat or handle, or "explosive, or so defective in some way as to be inherently "dangerous. There is, in our judgment, no such element of "inherent danger in a sound, stationary and immobile vehicle." Similarly, it can be said here that there was no such element of inherent danger in a sound, stationary and immobile chute such as the chute installed by the council in the present case. There was, however, the possibility, as events proved, that some small child using this chute might in some way or other climb over or get through the railings and fall from the platform at the top of the chute. There was that possibility, and that, I suppose, might be looked on as a danger inherent in the design of the railings. But there is no ground, in my view, for holding that the council knew of that danger, that is to say, appreciated the possibility that some child would do that. There was, of course, an obvious danger in the general sense that anyone who has attained a height may somehow or other fall from it, but that was not an element of inherent danger due to any defect in the chute; it was simply a quality possessed in common by every building or erection or piece of apparatus which enables a person to climb to a height above the ground.

As to the actual danger, if it can be so called, which brought about the accident, that, as I have said, was a danger knowledge of which cannot in my view fairly be brought home to the council. Perhaps I might make yet another citation from the judgment of Asquith L.J. in Sutton v. Bootle Corporation. He said this about the swing which was then in question[33]: "Having regard "to its construction and working, the occurrence of an accident "to a small child with a very limited reach was in my view "extremely unlikely and there were ample materials on which "to base a finding that neither through the attendant nor other-"wise can knowledge of its dangerous character—if indeed it can "be held to have possessed any—be properly imputed to the "defendants." It seems to me equally here it would, on the face of it, be so extremely unlikely a happening that a child should get through between the top and the second bars of the railings on the platform and so fall to the ground that one cannot fairly impute to the council knowledge of this risk in advance of the event.

Accordingly I am of opinion that this appeal should be allowed on the ground that when the relationship of licensor and licensee is applied in this case there has been no breach of duty on the part of the licensor council, because if there was anything in this chute amounting to a trap or concealed danger vis-à-vis the infant plaintiff it was not a trap or concealed danger of which the council can be held to have known; and, consequently, there was no danger of which they were under any duty to give warning to the infant plaintiff.

It is satisfactory that the result at which we have arrived accords, as I think, with the substantial justice of the case. It will be remembered that the judge found that the chute was acquired from reputable manufacturers, that it was of excellent design and sound construction, and had been properly installed. In other words, the defendant council, as it seems to me, had done all they could reasonably be expected to do to ensure that this piece of apparatus would be suitable and safe for children to use; and the unfortunate accident which occurred was certainly not due to anything which could reasonably be described as a dereliction of duty on their part. Accordingly, I agree that this appeal should be allowed.

Parker L.J. I so entirely agree with what my Lords have said that I can express my views very shortly.

The duty of an occupier of land to a licensee applies equally to children as to adults, and the occupier will not be liable for the consequences of dangers, in the case of adults obvious to the adults, and, in the case of children, obvious to the children. But the scope of the duty in the case of children is wider because what may not be an unusual danger or trap to an adult may be one to a child. And, again, a warning of the danger in question may be insufficient if the child were too young to take advantage of the warning. But this wider duty exists only when there is something on the premises, or in the present case in the implement provided, which amounts to a hidden danger or a trap, or where the implement is an allurement in the sense in which that word is used. Quite clearly, this implement—this chute—was an allurement in the sense that it was attractive to children and indeed was there for the use of children. But the fact that a child using it might injure itself does not make it an allurement in the sense in which that word is used. A child may hurt itself on anything.

Adopting the test laid down by Acton J. in Donovan v. Union Cartage Co. Ltd.[34] (to which my Lords have referred), I cannot persuade myself that this chute was an allurement in the sense that it was inherently dangerous, any more than was the van in that case.

I would only add this. The judge was clearly very much influenced by the evidence given by Mr. Jemmett, the chairman of the council, where he said that he would not allow his own child of four to play on this chute unaccompanied by a responsible adult, and when asked why, he said: "Because the child might "hurt himself." The judge, after referring to that, said: "That "no doubt is the reason why Mr. Jemmett said what he did. "Mr. Jemmett expressed a view which entirely coincides with "my own." Be it observed, Mr. Jemmett, in giving that evidence, was giving evidence as a reasonably prudent parent; not as an occupier of land. It may well be that the reasonably prudent parent would insist on the child being accompanied by an adult, not because there was any concealed danger, not because the danger was not obvious, but because the danger though obvious was not such as the child was old enough to protect himself against. That, as it seems to me, is not the consideration of the licensor, though it may well be the consideration and no doubt is the consideration of the reasonably prudent parent. Accordingly, for these and for the reasons given by my Lords, I would allow this appeal.

Appeal allowed.

Practice and Procedure—Pleadings—Negligence—Defence—Act of third party—Plaintiff injured by defective tool—Proposed defence that tool supplied by reputable firm—Defence to be pleaded—R.S.C. Ord. 19, rr. 4, 15.

ACTION.

The plaintiff, James Gibson Davie, who was employed by the defendants, was injured while using a drift and hammer when a splinter flew off from the drift and entered his left eye. By his statement of claim the plaintiff alleged that the accident was due to the negligence of the defendants in failing to supply him with a drift which could be hammered safely without the risk of pieces flying off. By their defence the defendants denied all the allegations of negligence in the statement of claim. During the opening of the plaintiff's case, counsel for the defendants indicated that the defendants would call evidence to show that the drift was bought by them from a firm of reputable manufacturers and that therefore the defendants were not negligent. Counsel for the plaintiff contended that he was taken by surprise because no indication had been given on discovery that the drift had been manufactured by persons other than the defendants.

Martin Jukes Q.C. and M. J. Morris for the plaintiff.
H. Tudor Evans for the defendants.

Tudor Evans. The defendants when setting up a defence of this sort are not obliged to say to the plaintiff, in addition to denying negligence, that the appliance or plant in question was purchased from some third party. The allegation which is set out in the statement of claim is that the particular tool was unsuitable in the respects there set out. Those are denied. The defendants do not have to go further and indicate, what is really a matter of evidence, that the drift was purchased from some third party. It is open to the defendants to say: "We were not "negligent, because as a matter of evidence we did not make the "thing. We bought it from a reputable supplier with whom we "have dealt for many years."

[Havers J. That leaves the plaintiff in a very unfortunate position, because supposing you succeeded on that defence he has had no opportunity of joining any other person.]

Tudor Evans. Where a defendant is charged with negligence it must be sufficient if he simply denies the negligence and denies each of the allegations of negligence which are set against him in the statement of claim.

[Havers J. When it is a denial of a failure to provide a suitable drift, what does your denial mean exactly?]

Tudor Evans. If you have a case of plant provided for the use of a workman where the plant has some latent defect not discoverable on reasonable examination, that is a matter which the defendants are obliged specifically to plead. But I know of no authority where it has been held that, where a denial of negligence involves the assertion that there may or may not have been negligence on the part of a third party, one is obliged positively to aver that in one's defence.

[Havers J. There may be a great deal of time wasted and money spent on the issue whether or not this is a suitable drift, whereas in fact your case may be: "It is not a suitable drift, "but I bought it from reputable suppliers."]

Tudor Evans. That is my defence. It often happens, particularly under the new R.S.C. Ord. 30, that the plaintiff serves a notice on the defendants to admit facts. One way in which this matter could have been settled was for the plaintiff to have delivered such a notice to the defendants and ask them to admit that the drift was manufactured by us.

Martin Jukes Q.C. This is a genuine surprise. If the defendants are going to rely on a set of facts which excuse their prima facie liability, they must plead it. It is in the nature of a confession and avoidance. We still do not know who is supposed to have supplied this particular drift. The makers ought to be here. I shall have to object at the appropriate stage to any evidence being adduced to suggest that this was made by any firm outside the defendants themselves. It would be unfair to the plaintiff to go on and perhaps lose his case, if one view of the law is that the defendants escape if they bought the drift from a reputable manufacturer, pay all the costs and then have to sue the manufacturers. He would have two actions and two sets of costs, one of which he would have to pay himself.

[HAVERS J. This raises an important point on pleadings in cases of this kind. The defendants had better put into writing the proposition upon which they are going to rely. Then I may have to rule whether or not it is open to them to raise that on their pleadings.]

Tudor Evans. The proposition is: That the defendants purchased the drift from a reputable supplier and were not negligent in failing to subject the drift to any test or examination before it was put into use.

[HAVERS J. I find that very difficult to extract from your pleading, because it leaves it open for you to say: "We did not "fail to provide you with a suitable drift." R.S.C. Ord. 19, r. 4, provides: "Pleading to state material facts and not evidence. "Every pleading shall contain, and contain only, a statement "in a summary form of the material facts on which the party "pleading relies for his claim or defence, as the case may be." Under the notes to that rule there appears this passage: "All "material facts. The general rule is thus stated by Cotton L.J. "in Philipps v. Philipps [1]:—'In my opinion it is absolutely "'essential that the pleading, not to be embarrassing to the "'defendants, should state those facts which will put the defen-"'dants on their guard, and tell them what they have to meet "'when the case comes on for trial.'"

R.S.C. Ord. 19, r. 15, provides: "The defendant or plaintiff "(as the case may be) must raise by his pleading all matters "which show the action or counterclaim not to be maintainable, "or that the transaction is either void or voidable in point of "law, and all such grounds of defence or reply, as the case may "be, as if not raised would be likely to take the opposite party "by surprise, or would raise issues of fact not arising out of the "preceding pleadings, as, for instance, fraud, Statute of Limita- "tions, release, payment, performance, facts showing illegality "either by statute or common law, or Statute of Frauds." The notes to Order 19, r. 15, say: "The office of a traverse is to "contradict, not to excuse or justify, the act complained of; its "object is to compel the plaintiff to prove the truth of the "allegation traversed, not to dispute its sufficiency in point of "law. All matters justifying or excusing the act complained of "must be specially and separately pleaded. . . . And no "evidence of such matters can, as a rule, be given at the trial "if they be not expressly pleaded."]

Tudor Evans. I would submit that it is sufficient that the defendants deny the negligence. If your Lordship rules against me on that, then I must apply for leave to amend.

Havers J. I feel bound to rule against you, basing myself on the orders to which I have referred and the notes. I think this clearly takes the plaintiff by surprise. I shall give leave to amend. The defendants to deliver their amended defence within ten days from today. The conditions of the leave will be that the defendants pay the costs of and occasioned by the amendment, including the costs thrown away today.

notice to be taken with regard to a point of procedure which it has observed as the result of considering this case, and it is this: Where a defendant is brought before a court for breach of a probation order, when he is arraigned before the court the breach should be put to him in the clearest possible terms and he should be asked to say whether he admits it or not. The way in which it should be put to him is as follows: he should be told the court at which he was convicted; the offence of which he was convicted and the terms of the probation order. He should then be told the grounds upon which it is alleged that he has broken the terms of the probation order. If the order has been broken by the commission of a further offence, he should be told the court at which he appeared, the offence with which he was charged and the adjudication of the court. If he admits the matters put to him, the court can then proceed to deal with him. If he denies those matters they must be proved and it being a trial albeit without a jury the defendant must be asked if he desires to give evidence and call witnesses. After all the evidence has been heard the court must pronounce whether it finds the breach proved. It is, therefore, desirable that the proceedings should begin by the matter being put clearly to the defendant and for him to be asked whether he admits the allegation.

date, not after February 29, 1956, as the new company might allow, by the holders of not less than 90 per cent. of every class of issued capital of Clan and of Union-Castle, or such less percentage, in the case of any such class or classes, as the new company might elect to accept, and on permission to deal and to quote being granted by the council of the Stock Exchange before the dispatch of letters of allotment. The plaintiff company contended (inter alia) that the circular was a "prospectus" to which section 38 [1] of the Companies Act, 1948, applied, and that as such it did not comply with the requirements of the Act:—

Held, (1) that a "prospectus" within the meaning of section 38 (3) was a document as defined in section 455 (1).

(2) That the circular did not involve an offer (i) for the purchase of shares, the shares in question being the unissued shares of the new company, and, as such, not the subject-matter of such an offer;

[1] Companies Act, 1948, s. 37: "A prospectus issued by or on behalf of a company or in relation to an intended company shall be dated, and that date shall, unless the contrary is proved, be taken as the date of publication of the prospectus."

Section 38 (3): "Subject to the provisions of the next following section, it shall not be lawful to issue any form of application for shares in or debentures of a company unless the form is issued with a prospectus which complies with the requirements of this section: Provided that this subsection shall not apply if it is shown that the form of application was issued either—(a) in connection with a bona fide invitation to a person to enter into an underwriting agreement with respect to the shares or debentures; or (b) in relation to shares or debentures which were not offered to the public. . . ."

Section 55 (1): "Any reference in this Act to offering shares or debentures to the public shall, subject to any provision to the contrary contained therein, be construed as including a reference to offering them to any section of the public, whether selected as members or debenture holders of the company concerned or as clients of the person issuing the prospectus or in any other manner, and references in this Act or in a company's articles to invitations to the public to subscribe for shares or debentures shall, subject as aforesaid, be similarly construed."

(2) "The foregoing subsection shall not be taken as requiring any offer or invitation to be treated as made to the public if it can properly be regarded, in all the circumstances, as not being calculated to result, directly or indirectly, in the shares or debentures becoming available for subscription or purchase by persons other than those receiving the offer or invitation, or otherwise as being a domestic concern of the persons making and receiving it, and in particular—(a) a provision in a company's articles prohibiting invitations to the public to subscribe for shares or debentures shall not be taken as prohibiting the making to members or debenture holders of an invitation which can properly be regarded as aforesaid; and (b) the provisions of this Act relating to private companies shall be construed accordingly."

Section 455 (1): "In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires, the following expressions have the meanings hereby assigned to them (that is to say) . . . 'prospectus' means any prospectus, notice, circular, advertisement, or other invitation, offering to the public for subscription or purchase any shares or debentures of a company. . . ."

(3) Further, that the circular was not an offer of shares "to "the public," as the offer could be accepted only by the shareholders of Union-Castle or Clan, the case falling within section 55 (2).

(4) Further, that the "form of acceptance and transfer" issued with the circular was not a "form of application for "shares" within the meaning of section 38 (3), but an acceptance of the offer of the new company and of the shares therein, and a transfer of the existing shareholding to the new company.

MOTION.

The plaintiff company, on behalf of itself and other shareholders and stockholders of Union-Castle, moved for an injunction against seven directors of Union-Castle and against Union-Castle. The motion arose out of the proposed merger between Union-Castle and Clan and sought, in effect, to restrain the carrying out of a scheme proposed by the directors of Union-Castle for the acquisition by the new company of the shares and stock in the issued capital of Union-Castle and Clan, in the terms of a circular dated November 12, 1955, and approved and recommended by Union-Castle. The circular was sent to all members of Union-Castle and of Clan, together with a form headed "Form "of acceptance and transfer."

Union-Castle was an independent company, its constitution providing that it should be a cardinal principle that it should remain in British control, and there being a number of safeguards to ensure that that should be so. The plaintiff company contended that the offer made no reference to that cardinal principle and that the provisions dealing with the preservation of British control and contained in the proposed articles of the new company were illusory.

By this motion, the plaintiff company asked (1) that the directors of Union-Castle be restrained until trial or further order from accepting or registering any transfer of shares of stock in Union-Castle to the new company or its assignees; (2) that the directors and Union-Castle be likewise restrained from (a) taking any step to effectuate the arrangements set out in the circular or those set out in the accompanying form; (b) issuing or distributing any further copies of the circular or the form or from acting as directors of the new company or from being concerned in any allotment of shares therein pursuant to the arrangements, or any of them, embodied in the form or circular; (c) making or undertaking to make out of Union-Castle's funds any payment in or towards the costs or expenses of or incidental to the promotion formation and registration of the new company or giving any financial assistance for the purpose of or in connexion with any purchase to be made of shares or stock in Union-Castle pursuant to the arrangements, or continuing to act agent for the new company for the purpose of or in connexion with any such purchase; (d) disclosing to the 1955. Dec. 9. Wynn-Parry J. This is a motion for interlocutory relief by way of injunction in an action brought by the plaintiff company on behalf of itself and all other shareholders and stockholders of Union-Castle other than the seven individual defendants who are the present directors of Union-Castle and other than Union-Castle itself. In substance what the plaintiff company seeks is a series of injunctions to prevent the defendants from taking any further step of any kind in connexion with an offer in writing dated November 12, 1955, made by the new company, to acquire the whole of each class of preference and ordinary shares and stock in the issued capitals of Union-Castle and Clan in exchange for preference and ordinary shares in the new company as set out in the circular. The offer is expressed to be conditional in these terms: "This offer is conditional upon "(i) acceptance on or before Friday, December 30, 1955, or "such later date if any (not being after February 29, 1954) as "the new company may allow, by the holders of not less than "90 per cent. of every class of issued capital of Clan and of "Union-Castle, or such less percentage in the case of any such "class or classes as the new company may elect to accept, and "(ii) permission to deal and quotation being granted by the "Council of The Stock Exchange, London, prior to the despatch "of letters of allotment."

I am not concerned on this motion with the merits or demerits of the terms of the offer from the point of view of the holders of shares and stock in Union-Castle. That is primarily a matter for each shareholder to consider for himself, but I am asked to intervene in this action upon a variety of grounds, which I shall proceed to examine.

[Dealing with the allegation that the provisions in the proposed articles of the new company directed to the preservation of British control were illusory, his Lordship considered the circular, the articles of Union-Castle and the proposed articles of the new company, and continued:]

If, as I hold to be the case, the safeguards in the case of the new company are as effective as in the case of Union-Castle, the risk cannot be greater in one than in the other. I therefore conclude that the plaintiff company fails to show that I ought to intervene on the ground that the safeguards for the preservation of British control of the new company are illusory.

The plaintiff company then attacked the circular, alleging that it contained representations which are misleading, and omissions which had the effect of making what was stated misleading. I should say at once that Mr. Lindon for the plaintiff company, expressly disclaimed any suggestion that the individual defendants were acting otherwise than perfectly bona fide throughout the matter. I think that in order to understand and consider the attacks which the plaintiff company makes on the circular, I should first consider its nature. It is alleged by the plaintiff company that it is a prospectus to which section 38 of the Companies Act, 1948, applies, and that as such it does not comply with the requirements of that Act. It is not disputed that if it is such a prospectus, it does in fact fail to comply with the requirements of the Act.

The word "prospectus" is defined in section 455 of the Companies Act, 1948. Subsection (1) of this section opens with the words: "In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires, "the following expressions have the meanings hereby assigned "to them (that is to say) . . . 'prospectus' means any "prospectus, notice, circular, advertisement, or other invitation, "offering to the public for subscription or purchase any shares "or debentures of a company. . . ." It is argued that "pros-"pectus" in section 38 of the Companies Act, 1948, has a wider meaning than in section 455, the reason put forward being that in subsection (3) reference is made to the issue of "A form of "application", and that there being nothing in the subsection to limit the issue of the form of application to an allotment and issue for cash, it must apply where the consideration is a consideration other than cash. This, it is said, constitutes a context requiring the word "prospectus" to cover documents not included in the definition in section 455. I do not accept this view. Section 38 follows section 37, which appears under the heading "prospectus." There is no ground whatsoever for giving the word "prospectus" in section 37 any more extended meaning than it has in section 455, and it would be strange if in the very next section "prospectus" were to be found to have a wider meaning. I can see no need to attribute any other meaning to "prospectus" in section 38 than that given in section 455. The reference in subsection (3) to a form of application means only a form of application in connexion with a prospectus offering shares for subscription or purchase.

GOVERNMENTS STOCK AND OTHER SECURITIES INVESTMENT CO. LTD. v. CHRISTOPHER.

Wynn-Parry J.

It is clear that the circular does not involve an offer for the purchase of any shares. The shares in question are unissued shares of the new company, so they cannot be the subject of an offer for purchase (see In re V.G.M. Holdings Ltd.[1]).

It becomes necessary, therefore, to consider the word "subscription" in the definition of "prospectus." In my view the word means: taking or agreeing to take shares for cash. It imports that the person agreeing to take the shares puts himself under a liability to pay the nominal amount thereof in cash. I think that this necessarily follows from the reasoning of Kekewich J. and the Court of Appeal in Arnison v. Smith,[2] and the judgments in Chicago Railway Terminal Elevator Company v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue[3] and Brown v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue.[4]

In Murray's Oxford Dictionary, one of the meanings attributed to "subscription" is: "A promise over one's signature to pay "a sum of money for shares in an undertaking." I can find no secondary meaning attributed to "subscription" in the Companies Act, 1948. On the contrary, paras. 4, 5, 6 and 7 of Part I of Sch. 4 to the Act clearly require that "subscription" and "subscribe" involve the notion of payment in cash. The circular in this case does not invite subscription for shares for cash. For these reasons I am of opinion that the circular is not a prospectus within the meaning of that word as used in the Companies Act, 1948. I would add that it would be somewhat strange if the circular were in fact a prospectus in view of the circumstance that the permission of the Board of Trade was obtained under section 13 of the Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act, 1939, on the basis that it was not a prospectus. I am further of opinion that the circular was not distributed to the public. I accept the proposition put forward by Sir Andrew Clark, namely, that the test is not who receives the circular, but who can accept the offer put forward. In this case it can only be persons legally or equitably interested as shareholders in the shares of Union-Castle or Clan. In the case of those who accept non-renounceable letters of allotment will be issued. In these circumstances the case appears to me to fall within section 55 (2) of the Companies Act, 1948.

With the circular was sent out a document headed "Form "of Acceptance and Transfer." Mr. Lindon, for the plaintiffs.

argued that, when examined, the document was in reality a form of application for shares in the new company, and in support of his proposition cited two cases decided under the Stamp Act, 1891, Coats v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue [5] and Chesterfield Brewery Company v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue.[6] Both those cases turned on the construction and scope of the phrase "conveyance on sale" as used in the Stamp Act, 1891, and I do not find them of assistance in this case. I can find no reason whatever for not giving to this form the meaning so clearly intended by its author. It opens with the words: "If "you wish to accept the accompanying offer you should sign "this form and forward it, together with your share certificate(s) "to the Union-Castle Mail Steamship Company Limited . . . "in the pre-paid envelope provided, so as to be received not "later than the close of business on Friday, December 30, 1955." Then follows the heading: "Form of Acceptance and Transfer." It is addressed to Union-Castle as agents for the new company, and it then states: "I/We", a blank being left for the name of the shareholder or stockholder to be inserted, "hereby "irrevocably accept the offer made to me/us by the British and "Commonwealth Shipping Company Limited (hereinafter called "'The new company') and contained in the new company's "circular letter (hereinafter called 'the offer') dated Novem-"ber 12, 1955, to acquire my/our holding of (blank) ordinary "stock in the Union-Castle Mail Steamship Company Limited "(hereinafter called 'the stock') upon the terms and subject to "the conditions set out therein." Paragraph (2) states that the stockholder encloses his stock certificate which is to be held by Union-Castle upon the terms of the offer. Paragraph (3) provides that, subject to the offer becoming unconditional, the signature of the stockholder to the form of acceptance and transfer shall constitute for Union-Castle an execution by the stockholder of an instrument of transfer of the stock to the new company, and the stockholder further undertakes to execute any further assurances that may be necessary in connexion with such transfer. The stockholder then authorizes and requests Union-Castle to forward to him a fully paid non-renounceable letter of allotment, and in due course a dividend certificate in respect of the shares of the new company to be allotted to the stockholder pursuant to the offer. There is then a dividend request, and a provision that in the event of the offer not becoming unconditional, Union-Castle is to return the certificate. Then follows provision for the signatures and the witnessing of the signatures of the stockholder or stockholders. To my mind nothing could be clearer. It is to operate as an acceptance of the offer made by the new company and of the shares in the new company, and as a transfer of the acceptor's holding in Union-Castle or Clan as the case may be. Why then should the court be astute to turn this form upside down or inside out in an attempt to give it some other meaning, particularly in view of the circumstance that I have held that the circular is not a prospectus, but what it purports to be, namely, the communication of an offer to exchange shares in the new company for shares in Union-Castle or Clan as the case may be.

It is against the background provided by the construction which I place on the circular, and the form accompanying it, that I turn to consider the allegations that the circular contains such material misrepresentations and omissions that I should intervene at this stage in a representative shareholders' action. In this regard it is, I think, necessary to bear in mind the proposition that a mere omission to state facts in the circular does not amount to a misrepresentation which would give rise to any cause of action, unless the effect of the omission is to render untrue or at least misleading some positive statement therein.

[His Lordship then dealt with the circular, referred to the pronouncement in the judgment of Sir George Jessel M.R. in Smith v. Chadwick [7] to the effect that, in circumstances such as those of the present case, the omission to state even material facts would not give rise to any cause of action unless the effect of the omission was to render untrue or at least misleading some positive statement, and held that the circular was not false or misleading. His Lordship then continued:] In the result, in my judgment, the plaintiff company is not entitled to any of the injunctions for which it asks, and consequently the motion must be dismissed with costs.

Motion dismissed.

Damages — Tax element — Loss of rent — Trespass and conversion — Whether income and profits tax which would have been payable on it to be taken into account.

The defendant unlawfully entered into possession of two farms, the property of the plaintiffs, a gravel company, and remained in occupation thereof for some 10 months during which time she paid no rent. The farm land and the buildings and equipment were depreciated by the bad husbandry and lack of care and attention of the defendant who also converted to her own use a portion of the hay which was stacked on the land. The plaintiffs recovered damages under the heads of both trespass and conversion. The damages for the former included a sum equal to one year's rent which the plaintiffs would have received but for the defendant's trespass:—

Held, (1) that, as the rent if it had been received would, on the evidence before the court, have been taxable in the hands of the plaintiffs, while the damages awarded under this head would not, the damages must be reduced by the amount of income tax and profits tax to which the rent would have been liable.

British Transport Commission v. Gourley [1956] 2 W.L.R. 41; [1955] 3 All E.R. 796 applied.

(2) That as none of the other items would, on the evidence, have been taxable in the hands of the plaintiffs the tax element must be disregarded in the award of damages under these heads.

REFERENCE OF ISSUES OF DAMAGES FOR TRIAL.

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment: The plaintiffs were a gravel company, and in 1954 they purchased about 165 acres of land at Chertsey. The land consisted of two farms, Abbey Chase Farm of 97 acres, and Abbey Bridge Farm of 65 acres, which were described in the sale particulars as overlying valuable sand and gravel deposits. The plaintiffs had no intention of farming the land themselves. They intended to let it upon terms that they could take it back as and when they required it for their business of extracting and selling sand and gravel. Abbey Chase Farm had been let but the tenant had agreed with the vendors to go out on September 29, 1954. Abbey Bridge Farm was in hand, and both farms were offered for sale with vacant possession. On September 29, 1954, the defendant entered into possession of both farms, and remained in occupation of the Bridge Farm until July 25, 1955, and of the Chase Farm until August 15, 1955. A draft lease, which she refused to sign, was put in evidence by the defendant. On February 21, 1955, the plaintiffs issued their writ and the statement of claim indorsed on it alleged that the defendant, in or about October, 1954, wrongfully and without any right or title so to do, entered and seized and took possession of the farm. It also alleged that the defendant had converted certain hay which was upon the farm at the time of her entry. On July 18, 1955, the action came on for trial before Pearce J., when the defendant did not contest the plaintiffs' claim, and an order was made that the issues as to damages raised in paragraphs 2 and 3 of the prayer be referred to an official referee for trial.

At the hearing before the official referee the damages were assessed by him upon the basis that the allegations made in the statement of claim were admitted and, so far as the damages for trespass were concerned, by contrasting the position in which the plaintiffs would have found themselves, had there been no trespass, with the actual events as they occurred. The following is a summary of the assessments:—

Trespass.

(i) One year's rent—£650.

(ii) Crops of kale and wheat straw eaten by the defendant's cattle—£7 8s. 4d.

(iii) Difference in value between the stacks of manure when the defendant entered into possession and when she quitted—£39 1s.

(iv) Depreciation in value of the unconverted hay due to the defendant's failure to cover it up—£160. (This sum was awarded notwithstanding the tenant to whom the land was subsequently let paid £239 16s. for this hay. The official referee regarded that payment as res inter alios acta.)

(v) Depreciation in unexhausted manurial values—£125.

(vi) Depreciation in value of fixtures—£26 5s.

(vii) Loss of interest on capital through the defendant's not paying tenant right moneys, whereby the plaintiffs could not, for one year, recover from an incoming tenant the moneys they had had to pay the outgoing tenant—£30.

(viii) Money spent by the plaintiffs in repairing fences broken by the defendant's cattle—£70.

(ix) No damages were awarded in respect of the defendant's failure to hedge and ditch, to clean the land or to repair the buildings since there was no evidence that the plaintiffs had suffered loss thereby.

(x) No allowance was made for the manurial values left by the defendant's cattle, since there was no evidence that they were fed on concentrates, or for the crop of hay left behind by the defendant, since the ownership of this was uncertain.

Conversion.

Conversion to her own use by the defendant of part of the hay stacked on the land when she entered into possession—£544.

but on the second day of the hearing the decision of the House of Lords in British Transport Commission v. Gourley[1] became known, and I adjourned in order that the parties might consider the position and call further evidence as to the tax position of the plaintiffs if they so desired.

It appears to me that the principles of Gourley's case[1] apply to claims for damages for trespass and conversion in the same way as they do to claim for damages for personal injuries. I am faced, however, with two problems which did not arise in Gourley's case.[1] There counsel agreed that the damages recovered by the plaintiff would not be taxable in his hands, here counsel have not been so accommodating. There the position of an individual partner was being considered, here I have to consider a trading company, assessed to tax under Schedule D, Case I, and a gravel company to boot, to whom unusual rules apply, see Stow Bardolph Gravel Co. Ltd. v. Poole.[2]

It seems to me that I must endeavour to find the answers to two questions. Whether any sums I award to the plaintiffs by way of damages will be subject to income tax or profits tax? If not, whether the plaintiffs would have been liable for income tax and profits tax if they had received the sums in respect of the loss of which I award them damages? Having regard to the difficulties which face me in attempting to answer these questions it is important to see where the onus of proof lies. Is it for the plaintiff to prove that the damages awarded will be taxable or that the sums in lieu would not have been taxable or is it for the defendant? I can find no direct statement on this matter in Gourley's case, but the opinion of Lord Jowitt[3] does not indicate that there is any shifting of the onus which in matters relating to damages normally rests on a plaintiff. I must therefore, with the inadequate materials put before me by Mr. Higham, the plaintiffs' accountant, do my best to answer the two questions I have propounded.

I must, I think, consider separately (a) the damages for conversion of the hay, (b) the damages of £650 in lieu of rent, and (c) the damages representing the difference between the outgoing and incoming valuations. It was a condition of the sale of the land that the plaintiffs should take and pay for the hay and the outgoing valuations. The purchase by a gravel company of potential sources of supply is treated by the Revenue as a dealing in capital not in income: see the Stow Bardolph case.[4] True Mr. Higham did not tell me whether the sums paid out for the hay and the outgoing valuations were taken into account in arriving at their profits for the year 1954–1955. But I think that the plaintiffs are entitled to say that, if the damages under (a) and (c) are capital receipts so are the sums in lieu, and if the damages are income receipts they are subject to tax: see Wiseburgh v. Domville.[5] In spite of the paucity of evidence adduced by the plaintiffs I feel that I ought to allow headings (a) and (c) in full. All that Mr. Higham told me was that the plaintiffs intended to pay tax on such receipts as were taxable, that for the year 1954–1955 they had only distributed one-seventh of their taxable profit, and that it was their policy to reimburse tenants who have had to incur unusual expenses. His evidence gave me very little assistance. He did not even tell me the amount of the Schedule A assessment.

I feel, however, that the correct conclusion for me to reach is that the plaintiffs have satisfied me that what lies ahead of them is a battle with the Revenue the result of which is very uncertain, and that so far as headings (a) and (c) are concerned the balance of the probabilities is that they will not obtain any tax advantage by receiving an award of damages, instead of receiving the sale price of the hay and the incoming valuations in 1954.

So far as heading (b) is concerned I see no reason why this sum of £650 should be taxable in the hands of the plaintiffs. Having considered the operation of section 175 of the Income Tax Act, 1952,[6] I cannot see how it can be said that the plaintiffs are liable for tax in respect of this award of £650 as damages for trespass. On the other hand, if it had been received as rent it would have been taxable. As the plaintiffs have given no evidence as to the amount of the Schedule A assessment I must, I think, assume it is so small as to be negligible. In the result the plaintiffs will, unless I make a deduction, recover £650 tax free instead of £650 less tax and profits tax. I propose to deduct 50 per cent. from the damages I award in lieu of rent. I arrive at the figure of 50 per cent. as follows:

If one assumes that the plaintiffs make a profit of	£1,000
Income tax at the standard rate would be	£425
2½ per cent. profits tax on £1,000	25
25 per cent. profits tax on £143 viz. 1/7th of the taxable profit	35
Tax on £1,000 equals	£485

From the damages of £650 awarded in lieu of rent I therefore deduct £325.

Judgment for the plaintiffs for £1,390.

PRACTICE NOTE.

Libel and Slander—Practice—Statement in open court—Settlement of libel action—Statement to be approved by judge in chambers—R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 2 (4).

STATEMENT IN OPEN COURT.

On November 3, 1955, the plaintiff issued a writ claiming, inter alia, damages for libel contained in a book published by the defendants. A statement of claim was delivered, but before delivery of a defence terms of settlement were arrived at on the defendants agreeing, inter alia, to pay a sum of money to the plaintiff and to the reading of an agreed statement in open court. No money was paid into court.

On February 13, 1956, on a summons for directions taken out under R.S.C. Ord. 30, Master Burnand ordered "that the "action be tried at Middlesex by a judge alone and be set down "within seven days for the purpose of making an agreed state-"ment in a libel action." Thereupon the action was set down and on February 21, 1956, was listed for hearing before Slade J. as a "statement in open court." The agreed statement had not been submitted to Slade J. or to any judge for approval.

A. T. Hoolahan for the defendants.

SLADE J. Although the statement to be read in this case is unexceptionable and I will allow it to be read, it should first have been approved by a judge. Whenever it is desired, upon the settlement of an action for libel or slander, to make a statement in open court, the agreed statement should (1) be approved by a judge, and (2) normally be made before the judge who has approved it. This practice should be followed whether the reading of the statement follows the acceptance and taking out of money which has been paid into court, so as to fall within the precise terms of R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 2 (4),[1] or whether the statement is a term of a settlement which includes an agreement to pay money (or costs) which has not been paid into court, and whether the money so payable has actually been paid or is to be paid in the future. I say that the statement should "normally" be made before the judge who has approved it because one can envisage circumstances where it is essential that the plaintiff's reputation should be vindicated at the earliest possible moment, and the judge may, for example, have gone on circuit and not be readily accessible. In those circumstances it would be perfectly proper to obtain the permission of some other judge for the statement to be made before him, and he should then, of course, be shown the statement which it is desired to make and which will already have been approved by his brother judge.

Railway—Negligence—Guard's duty—Person struck by door of guard's van—Door still open after train had travelled 60 yards—Rules for the working of the railway—Contributory negligence.

While standing on a station platform seeing her husband off in a train, the plaintiff was struck from behind by the open door of the guard's van, which the guard was just closing, after the train had moved about 60 yards along the platform. In an action for damages for personal injuries the plaintiff alleged negligence against the British Transport Commission, and the commission alleged contributory negligence by the plaintiff:—

Held that, although the ordinary practice whereby the guard gave the signal to start while standing on the platform and boarded the train as it began to move was one which worked for safety, there was a duty owed to persons allowed to be on the platform and the door of the guard's van ought not to have been still open at the distance which the train had travelled when the plaintiff was struck; that, in view of that distance, the plaintiff was not bound to anticipate an open door coming up behind her; and that, therefore, the plea of contributory negligence failed and the commission were liable in negligence for the injuries sustained by the plaintiff.

Action.

On June 8, 1954, the second plaintiff, Mrs. Edith Wilhemina Joan Hare, went to Euston Station to see her husband, Albert Cyril Hare, the first plaintiff, off by the 4.15 p.m. train to Chester. She stood on the platform about 60 yards from the rear of the train and, as it began to move was waving to her husband when she was struck from behind by the open door of the guard's van at the rear of the train, and was thrown off the platform on to the permanent way, sustaining injuries. The plaintiffs sued the British Transport Commission for damages arising out of the second plaintiff's injuries, alleging that they had been caused by the negligence of the defendants, their servants or agents.

The defendants denied negligence; alternatively they alleged that the accident was solely caused, or, alternatively, contributed to, by the negligence of the second plaintiff in placing herself too close to the train and the permanent way at the side of the platform as the train was moving out of the station and the door of the guard's van on the train was still open and likely to knock her down.

The facts are more fully stated in the judgment.

Leonard Caplan Q.C. and Thomas Whipam for the plaintiffs.

The following case, in addition to those mentioned in the judgment, was cited in argument: Burns v. North British Railway Co.[1]

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 22. LORD GODDARD C.J. On June 8, 1954, the plaintiff, Mrs. Hare, went to Euston Station to see her husband off to Chester by the 4.15 p.m. train. She was carrying a baby and was accompanied by her mother-in-law. The train, apparently one of the important expresses, was made up of 10 coaches and filled the length of No. 13 platform. No one was at all sure as to the coach in which Mr. Hare took a seat, but it is clear, I think, that it was well to the rear of the train and was either the first or second coach in front of the guard's van. He stood at the window talking to his wife until the train started; then she continued to wave to him as the train drew away, and while doing so she received a sudden blow on the back of the shoulder which caused her to fall from the platform. There is no doubt what hit her; it was the door of the guard's van which he was just closing, as I will later describe.

Mrs. Hare, as she fell, managed to throw her baby on to the platform. She lay between the inner rail and the wall of the platform and I think must have fallen in the space between the end of the van and the front of the pushing engine which followed the train to assist it up the steep incline outside the station. It must indeed have been a terrifying experience and little short of a miracle that she was not killed. As it was, she was for 12 weeks in hospital and was more or less of an invalid for a considerable time, as there were certain complications and injury undetected at first. She still has some small measure of permanent disablement, but after what was doubtless a trying and occasionally painful period she is now happily substantially recovered.

Fortunately, there was no great pecuniary loss, and I think

v.
BRITISH TRANSPORT COMMISSION.

Lord Goddard C.J.

a fair sum to award her, if the defendants are liable for her injuries, is £750 in addition to £26 special damage and £58 special damage to the husband. There is a claim by the husband for loss of consortium. No doubt he had to fend for himself while the wife was in hospital and during periods of her incapacity at home. Loss of consortium still survives as a cause of action, but it is not one, I think, for which the courts should give generous compensation in addition to such legitimate expenses as a husband has had to incur on account of his wife's absence. In addition to his special damage, I award him £20.

As I have said, there is no doubt that Mrs. Hare was struck by the door of the guard's van and reliance is naturally placed on the rules for the working of the railway which provide that doors are to be closed before the train starts. The particular rules are rule 25 (a) and rule 130, paragraph (ii).[1]

The facts of this case appear to me to be indistinguishable from those in Thatcher v. Great Western Railway.[2] In that case no doubt Lopes L.J. attached importance to similar rules as supplying evidence of negligence when it was shown that a door was open. For myself, I should not regard this as conclusive, because, in my opinion, these rules are designed for the protection of passengers in the train, so that they should not be exposed to the risk of an open or insecurely fastened door. I cannot think that these rules compel the guard of a passenger train to be in his van with the door closed the moment the train starts. It is common knowledge that the guard gives the signal to start standing on the platform and, as a rule, boards the train as it begins to move, and this seems to me not only an ordinary practice, but one which works for safety, as he can see that all is well as the train actually starts.

It would, however, be another thing if the train were allowed to go some distance along the platform with the door open. The principal difficulty I have had in this case, and I readily admit I have not found the question of fact easy of determination, is to come to a conclusion as to how far the train had moved before Mrs. Hare was struck. I have said that no one is sure of where

(ii) see that the doors of the "carriages and other vehicles are "properly closed and fastened, and "assist the station staff in this duty; "also in the case of any unusual stop- "page, request the passengers not to "alight except when it is necessary "for them to do so."

on the train Mr. Hare had taken a seat; his recollection is only that he was somewhere near the bookstall. I can only say, as indeed I have said earlier, that I think that he was somewhere either in the first or second coach in front of the van, and I also think more probably in the second, which would be nearer the bookstall.

I had no evidence from the defendants as to where Mrs. Hare was picked up beyond what the fireman of the banking engine could tell me. I have no doubt that when Mrs. Hare was struck she was spun round, as a witness, Mr. Wright, described, and that she fell between the end of the van and the banking engine. The latter was evidently not of the tank or shunting type, but had a tender attached, and according to the fireman's evidence it must have come into the station tender-first as it was that which was against the buffers. His evidence was that the engine was an engine-length beyond the bridge which crosses the platform when Mrs. Hare fell.

To try to get a clearer picture of the place than that which is conveyed by plans or photographs, I visited the station and went to the platform to take particular notice of the distance from the buffers to the bridge, and of the position of the bookstall, and I am satisfied that the train must have travelled at least 60 yards by the time Mrs. Hare was struck.

In these circumstances, I am bound to hold, on the authority of Thatcher's case,[3] which was followed with approval by the Court of Session in Tough v. North British Railway Co.,[4] that the plaintiffs have established a cause of action. Mr. Stephenson cited Toal v. North British Railway Co.[5] and contended that from that case it appeared that there was not an absolute rule to be derived from Thatcher's case,[6] which was there cited, but that each case must be decided on its own facts.

While there may be cases of open doors causing injury which can be distinguished, the facts here are identical, so it seems to me, with those in Thatcher's case; moreover, in Toal's case[7] the Court of Session had rejected a proof and the House of Lords sent the case back for trial, saying that it was for the jury to consider whether there was a duty and whether it was broken.

In the present case I feel obliged to find that, considering the distance the train had travelled before Mrs. Hare was struck, the van door ought not to have been open. The case for the defendants really was, in my opinion, that Mrs. Hare had been guilty of contributory negligence, or rather that it was her negligence that was wholly the cause of the accident. But as it is established that a duty is owed to persons allowed to be on the platform, Mrs. Hare was entitled to assume that the doors would be closed. She was looking, not to the back of the train, but in the direction in which it was travelling, and was not bound to anticipate an open door coming up behind her. I think she did take a step back, as Mr. Wright described, but I cannot hold that that of itself was negligent.

I have ascertained from the Record Office, where the pleadings in Thatcher's case [8] are still preserved, that there was in that case a plea of contributory negligence which must have been found against the railway company and was not even mentioned in the Court of Appeal. The facts in that case seem to be at least as strong to support a plea of contributory negligence as in the present case. but it did not avail the defendants. I must accordingly give judgment for the sums I have mentioned, namely, £776 for Mrs. Hare and £78 for her husband, with costs.

*REGINA v. STOKESLEY, YORKSHIRE, JUSTICES. Ex parte BARTRAM.

Crown Practice—Certiorari—Practice—Affidavits—Cross-examination of deponents—Power of the court to allow cross-examination—Circumstances in which cross-examination allowed—R.S.C., Ord. 38, Ord. 59, r. 47.

On March 12, 1947, justices made an order whereby the applicant was adjudged to be the putative father of a bastard child and ordered to pay 12s. 6d. a week maintenance. The complainant did not seek to enforce the order for eight years, but in 1955 she applied to the collecting officer, and in September, 1955, a summons was served on the applicant in respect of arrears due under the order. On January 25, 1956, the applicant applied for an order of certiorari to bring up and quash the order of March 12, 1947, on the grounds that no summons had been served on him to appear before the justices on that date, that having no knowledge that proceedings were taking place he had not appeared, and that the justices had no jurisdiction to make the order; and he denied that he was the father of the child. There was before the court an affidavit sworn by the applicant in support of his case, an affidavit by a police constable to the effect that he had served the summons on the applicant on March 7, 1947 (although he could not remember handing it personally to the applicant), and an affidavit by the justices to the effect that they had satisfied themselves that the summons had been served and had seen the certificate of service endorsed on a copy of the summons before adjudicating. There was also before the court the original of the order made by the justices on March 12, 1947, on which the printed words "[the "appearance of the defendant]" had been struck out so that it read "On proof of service . . ." The court, relying to some extent on the order, was satisfied that the summons had been served and dismissed the application. Subsequently, before the order of the court was drawn up, it was made known to the court that the order had been altered in that the words "[the appearance of the "defendant]" had not been struck out when it was originally drawn up but had been deleted between the time when it had been inspected by the applicant's solicitor for the purposes of the application and the time when it was put before the court. The court ordered that the application be reheard and that the deponents should attend. At the rehearing, on applications by both sides for leave to cross-examine on affidavits:—

Held, that by virtue of R.S.C., Ord. 59, r. 47, and Ord. 38 the court had power to allow cross-examination of a deponent in Crown proceedings, and that, although the power would only be exercised in very special circumstances, the case was of such an exceptional and remarkable character that leave should be given in order to enable the court to get to the bottom of the matter.

APPLICATION for an order of certiorari.

On January 25, 1956, the applicant, Thomas Edward Bartram, a farmer, having obtained leave, applied to the court for an order of certiorari to bring up and quash an order made by Stokesley justices on March 12, 1947, whereby he was adjudged to be the putative father of a bastard child and was ordered to pay 12s. 6d. per week for the maintenance and education of the child until it should attain 16 years of age, £4 18s. 6d. for expenses incidental to the birth of the child and 10s. 6d. costs. The grounds of the application were that no summons had been served on the applicant to appear before the justices' court on March 12, 1947, or at any time, on complaint that he was the putative father of a bastard child; that, having no knowledge that proceedings were taking place, he did not appear at the justices' court on the day that the complaint was heard and the order made; and that, in the premises, the justices had no jurisdiction to make the order. Further grounds were that the order made on March 12, 1947, was at no time served on him; that he was not the father of any child of the complainant; and that the first that he had heard of the order was over eight years later on September 7, 1955, when a summons dated August 24, 1955, was served upon him to appear before the justices on complaint that payments under the order had not been made and that there were arrears of £275 12s. 6d. and £4 18s. 6d. expenses and 10s. 6d. costs.

The applicant also sought an order of certiorari to bring up and quash an order made by the justices on September 14, 1955, ordering him to pay the sum of £5 in respect of arrears under the order of March 12, 1947.

At the hearing of the application there were before the court, amongst others, affidavits sworn by the applicant, a police officer, and the justices. The applicant in his affidavit stated that he had at no time been served with any summons in connexion with the complaint until the summons dated August 24, 1955, was served upon him, and that that was the first intimation that he received that any proceedings had taken place affecting him as being allegedly the putative father of a bastard child, and he denied that he was the father of any child of the complainant. The police constable, in his affidavit, stated that on March 7, 1947, at about 11 a.m. he had visited the farm of the applicant to serve a summons upon him; so far as he remembered he handed the summons to the applicant personally; he remembered that at that time the weather was unusually severe with deep snow but recollected that he had no difficulty in reaching the farm and visiting it; he said that he could not clearly remember the particular act of handing the summons to the applicant but that it was his practice at that time to endorse a copy of the summons with the usual certificate of service stating the time, date, place and manner of service, and to return the summons to the police division where it was issued; he had inspected the record of charges for the relevant period kept by the petty sessional division in question of the North Riding Constabulary, and had observed an entry in which it appeared that the summons had been served by him on March 7, 1947, at 11 a.m. The justices, in their affidavit, stated that they recalled adjudicating upon the complaint on March 12, 1947; they also recalled that the applicant had not appeared, as a result of which they had ascertained by reference to the endorsement of the certificate of service on the back of the copy of the summons produced to them that it had been duly served before they proceeded to hear the case in his absence. It appeared from an affidavit sworn by the complainant that she had not pressed for payment under the order because at the time of the birth of the child she was living with her mother, and had continued to live with her until her death in January, 1955, but that since then she could not manage to maintain the child out of her earnings without the help of her mother.

There was also before the court, exhibited to the justices' affidavit, the original of the order made by the justices on March 12, 1947; it was the ordinary printed form ("A. 11," under the Affiliation Orders Act, 1914, s. 6 (1), and Bastardy (Forms) Order, 1915) in use for such order, and the words in square brackets "[the appearance of the defendant]," "[left "at the defendant's last place of abode]," and "[and also the "evidence tendered [by] [on behalf of] the defendant]" had been struck out so that it read: "On [. . .] proof that a "summons to answer the said complaint was duly served on "the defendant. . . ." It appeared that the copy of the summons which was before the justices could not be traced; it also appeared that no notice to pay had ever been served on the applicant.

The court (Lord Goddard C.J., Hilbery and Stable JJ.), having read the affidavits and heard counsel on both sides, and having examined the original order, was satisfied that the summons had been duly served on the applicant on March 7, 1947, and on January 25, 1956, gave judgment dismissing the application; in reaching that conclusion the court was to a certain extent impressed by the order of March 12, 1947. Later, on the same day, it was made known to the court that the order placed before it had been altered in that the words " [the " appearance of the defendant] " had not been struck out at the time when it was originally drawn up but had been struck out between the time when it had been inspected by the applicant's solicitor for the purposes of the application and the time when it was placed before the court. The court thereupon directed that its order dismissing the application should not be drawn up and that the case should be re-heard, and the presence of the deponents was required.

A. J. Irvine for the applicant.

Alan Garfitt for the justices.

Counsel on either side, at the invitation of the court, applied for leave to cross-examine on affidavits.

No cases were cited in argument.

LORD GODDARD C.J.: This is probably the first case in recent history in which application has been made in Crown proceedings for leave to cross-examine on affidavits. Leave has never been given, or at least not for a great number of years. In Rex v. Kent Justices, Ex parte Smith,[1] Lord Hewart C.J., sitting with Avory and Shearman JJ., said: " For something like fifty or " sixty years no order had been made on the Crown side for the " cross-examination of a deponent. It was enough to add that " such an order was not likely to be made except in very special " circumstances, and that no such special circumstances had " been shown in the present case."

I have no doubt that the court has power to allow cross-examination because Order 59, which was passed in 1938,[2] takes the place of the old Crown Office Rules and is the rule under which the court deals with Crown matters, it expressly provides by rule 47 that all the Rules of the Supreme Court apply to Crown proceedings. Rule 47 provides: " Subject to the " provisions of this Order, the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, " shall apply, so far as applicable, to proceedings to which this " Order relates, in like manner as they apply to other proceedings " in the Supreme Court," and it is well known that there is another order, Order 38, which provides for cross-examination upon affidavits.

This is an exceptional case. The applicant is seeking to set aside an order which was obtained eight years ago and on which the complainant who had obtained the order had never acted. It is a very remarkable and a very exceptional case, and there are other matters which have given the court a great deal of anxiety and some displeasure, and this court must get to the bottom of this matter.

We think, therefore, that cross-examination should be allowed.

Application allowed.

The applicant's affidavit was then put in, and he was cross-examined on it and re-examined; and, their affidavits having been put in, the police constable and the chairman of the justices were cross-examined.

Counsel then addressed the court.

Lord Goddard C.J., in the course of his judgment dismissing the application, said: As it was such a remarkable case, and there was this unfortunate incident of an altered order having been put before the court, upon which, at any rate to some extent, the court had relied, we ordered that the deponents should attend in court today. They have attended and they have been cross-examined. I desire to say that it is the first time in my experience, and I think the first time in anyone else's experience, in Crown proceedings for prerogative writs, that cross-examination has ever taken place. I do not want this to be thought to be an easy precedent. We allowed cross-examination in this case because it is a case of a very remarkable character.

Lord Merriman P. and Collingwood J.

Husband and Wife—Justices—Non-cohabitation clause—Possibility of reconciliation—Revocation of clause—Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 39), ss. 5 (a), 7.

A wife who was married in October, 1953, obtained in November, 1954, when she was pregnant, an order of the justices against her husband on the grounds of persistent cruelty, desertion, and neglect to maintain. The parties had cohabited since the last act of the alleged cruelty (which to a large extent consisted of physical violence), but the justices had held that it had been revived by desertion. The order contained a non-cohabitation clause. The husband made certain overtures to effect a reconciliation, which were resisted; and he applied in September, 1955, to have the order discharged or alternatively to have it varied by the revocation of the non-cohabitation clause. There had been no question of physical violence during the separation.

The justices, while stating that the marriage could be saved if the husband were to approach his wife in the proper way, and that the wife was ready for a reconciliation if the correct approach were made, dismissed the applications on the basis that the husband had not learned his lesson, and had not shown his regret for his past conduct, and that the wife should accordingly still have the protection of the non-cohabitation clause:—

Held, (1) that, by reason of the non-cohabitation clause, the wife had been justified in resisting such overtures as had been made, for the clause itself effectively precluded the making of any overtures at all; and the application to have the whole order discharged had therefore rightly been dismissed.

(2) That the justices had misdirected themselves by stating that the wife should still have the protection of the non-cohabitation clause; the protection to which she would be entitled in the circumstances was her right to resist any overtures in which the husband did not show that he had realised the error of his ways. It was undesirable to retain that which militated against a possible reconciliation.

(3) That the non-cohabitation clause should accordingly be removed.

Haynes v. Haynes [1952] P. 272; [1952] 2 T.L.R. 313; [1952] 2 All E.R. 439 applied.

APPEAL by husband from the refusal to discharge an order of the justices for the Wimbledon petty sessional division made on the grounds of cruelty, desertion and neglect to maintain, or, alternatively, to vary that order by the revocation of a non-cohabitation clause.

The parties were married in October, 1953, and evidence had been accepted when the original order was made on November 18, 1954, that the husband had been guilty of physical cruelty towards the wife. The last act of physical ill-treatment had taken place about Whitsuntide, 1954; but although cohabitation had temporarily been resumed, the justices in making their order held that the cruelty had been revived by subsequent desertion. A child was born to the wife in February, 1955.

Thereafter the husband made certain overtures for a reconciliation which the wife rejected, although the justices found that she was ready for a reconciliation if the husband were to show, "by his conduct and attitude towards her, that he was sorry for "his past actions and would assure her by his words and conduct "that he wished to make amends and that he would treat her "with reasonableness in the future."

GUINESS v. GUINESS.

Stanislaus Seuffert and M. A. Gregory for the husband appellant.

D. R. Ellison for the wife respondent.

The following cases were cited in argument: Haynes v. Haynes [1]; Hutchison v. Hutchison.[2]

LORD MERRIMAN P. This is a husband's appeal from a decision of the justices for the Wimbledon petty sessional division of Surrey, who, on September 1, 1955, had before them two complaints of the husband. The first was an application to discharge an order which had been made against him on November 18, 1954, and which, apart from maintenance, also contained a non-cohabitation clause, which has the effect of a separation order, and the second was to vary that order by eliminating for the future the non-cohabitation clause. In fact they dismissed both complaints. On this appeal no attempt, very rightly, in my opinion, has been made to challenge the propriety of their dismissing the application to set the whole order aside. The appeal is limited solely to the question whether or not the non-cohabitation clause had better come out of the order.

As in one respect—though I think it is a vital respect, as I shall try to show—I differ from the justices, I wish to say this without the slightest reservation of any kind: I have absolutely nothing but praise for the scrupulous care and attention which they have obviously given to this matter. The statement of their reasons and the notes of the evidence are models of what such things should be, and in saying that I include also the note of the earlier hearing, at which the original order was made.

As there is no challenge (it is of course much too late now) to the validity of the original order, and as the history of that is so clearly set out in the reasons which the justices give in connection with the present application, the accuracy of which is not challenged in any particular at all, I am really absolved from going in great detail into this matter.

Suffice it to say that this is a young couple who were only married in October, 1953. They are still, therefore—and this is an important factor in the case—in relation to the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, under the statutory bar to bringing proceedings—either of them—for divorce. Another important factor which I think should be mentioned, and one which Mr. Ellison in his very clear argument did not dispute, though he did not expressly admit it, and which, as I see it, is now common ground, is that the last act of ill-treatment of a physical nature occurred at or about Whitsuntide, 1954. It is also a curious circumstance that the justices held at the time of making the original order, on the grounds of persistent cruelty, desertion and wilful neglect to maintain, that although the cruelty had been condoned and there had been a resumption of cohabitation, so that for either of those two reasons it was out of the picture, it had been revived by desertion. From this it follows that we are really dealing with what would be a continuous charge of desertion, albeit coupled, in the background, with a finding of conduct which amounted to persistent cruelty, and that the desertion would have been running all this time in favour of the wife had it not been that there was this non-cohabitation clause in the order. I think one other circumstance is worth referring to, and that is that at the time when the matter was first dealt with, in November, 1954, the wife, in whose favour the finding of persistent cruelty was made, was still an expectant mother. The child was born in February, 1955. I mention this because quite plainly that was one valid reason, if there were no other, for holding that it was necessary to protect the wife, who had been treated with cruelty which consisted to a very large extent of physical violence, from any possible repetition of that conduct at a time when she was an expectant mother.

As I have already said, there is no challenge whatever against the validity or propriety of the original order and the inclusion in it of the non-cohabitation clause, and we are concerned solely to deal with the question whether that clause should now be retained.

The justices have realised one aspect of the matter quite correctly, and in this respect they are supported by a passage in my own judgment in the case to which they were referred by their clerk, Haynes v. Haynes,[1] in which I said[2]: "I recognize "that so long as this non-cohabitation clause stands the wife can "resist any overtures"—that is, overtures by the husband to effect a reconciliation. They state in their reasons that they recognise that. They go on to say that they are satisfied that the wife, who was, of course, the defendant to this particular summons, "really wanted a reconciliation if only the husband "would, by his conduct and attitude towards her, show that he "was sorry for his past actions and assure her by his words and "conduct that he wished to make amends and that he would "treat her with reasonableness in the future." In the next paragraph they set out the facts, which I think are very important. They say that there was no question, during the separation, that the husband had shown any signs of physical violence towards the wife, and the defendant had not been frightened of any physical violence from him during that period. She expressly said that in her evidence. "However," they go on: "the husband had not either by his words or conduct shown "the defendant that he had learned his lesson and realised the " error of his ways and he had not shown his regret for his past " conduct." He had not spoken to her in a proper tone, and, in the wife's words, had treated her " like a bit of dirt." They add: " His general attitude is also shown by the fact that he " visited her with his brother, with whom the wife was not on " friendly terms."

Now, the whole of that paragraph can be summed up, apart from the statement that the wife was not frightened of any violence, and had not been during this period, in the sentence that he had not learned his lesson and that, in effect, he cannot ask to be taken back until he shows that he has done so. The justices come back to that again in what I think is a perfectly unimpeachable statement of the position in paragraph 10. They say, after dealing with the preceding paragraph, with which I will deal in a moment: " The justices felt, however, that this " marriage could be saved and there could be a reconciliation, " if only the husband would approach the wife with an entirely " different attitude, showing her that he recognised the error " of his ways, that he regretted his past conduct and that such " conduct would not recur," and then, more specifically, they say " and that he would provide a suitable home for the wife " away from his or her relations," and with this in mind they add that they have informed both parties that they could, if they so wished, invoke the assistance of the probation officer. Now, with every word of that paragraph I agree. It exactly sums up the position of this husband. Unless he proves that he has recognised the error of his ways, does regret his past conduct, and gives his wife assurance that such conduct will not recur, and so forth, he will not get very far with any overtures for a reconciliation. And he has got to satisfy the court before whom he goes that that really is his attitude.

But let it be recalled that earlier on in their reasons the justices rightly said: " As there was a non-cohabitation clause in " the order the defendant was entitled to resist any overtures " made by the husband for reconciliation," and that is why, quite rightly, they dismissed his application to revoke the whole order based as it was on the ground that he had made such overtures, which she was entitled, by the very existence of the non-cohabitation clause, to resist.

I now come to the one statement in their reasons with which I differ. In the paragraph immediately preceding paragraph 10, which I read a moment ago, they say: " In view of the above " facts and conclusions the justices felt that the defendant should " still have the protection of the non-cohabitation clause, and, " therefore, they dismissed the second complaint applying for " variation of the order by striking out the said clause." And then it is that they say they felt that the marriage could be saved, and they set out the handicap under which the husband still laboured. In my opinion they have made an error of judgment in the way in which they have justified the retention of the non-cohabitation clause. The wife's protection to which she is entitled is that which was set out in clause 10. She is entitled to resist any overtures in which the husband does not recognise the error of his ways, in which, to put it shortly, he does not show that he has learned his lesson; and if he shows them that is the position, or does not succeed in showing them the contrary, there is an end to any overtures for reconciliation on his part. But it is not necessary, in order to achieve that purpose, to maintain a clause in the order which effectually precludes the making of any overtures at all, because the wife is entitled to resist them by virtue of the very existence of the clause.

I think that this is a case in which we must differ from the justices in that respect, and allow the appeal, and order that the non-cohabitation clause be eliminated from the earlier order.

COLLINGWOOD J. I agree. Counsel for the appellant does not suggest for a moment that it was not perfectly proper that this non-cohabitation clause should have been inserted in the original order of November, 1954. But the subsequent history, the relationship which has arisen between these parties since then, gives rise to considerable hope that they may be reconciled.

The marriage only took place in October, 1953, and, without going into details, the parties have been meeting, and the circumstances in which they have been meeting indicate that there is a good chance of their becoming reconciled. One only has to look at one or two sentences in the evidence of the wife. She says "I think if my husband encouraged me, and did not treat me "like a bit of dirt, we would get on fine"; and later, "It is only "my husband's attitude towards me. I am not frightened of "him at all. I would probably go back if he would encourage "me more." Then follows a very significant phrase:—"If my "husband changed his attitude and the way he spoke to me, "and courted me again, most probably I would go back. I "would then consider going to a new town", the suggestion having been that in no circumstances would she leave the district in which her parents were.

That being so, in my opinion anything which militates against that possible reconciliation is undesirable, and quite clearly this clause is an impediment to the very overtures which the wife says might very well be successful were they made in the right way.

This young man seems to be somewhat uncouth in his manners, but possibly, now that the respect in which his previous efforts and advances leave much to be desired has been brought home to him, as it clearly is brought home to him in paragraph 10 of the justices' reasons, he will see the manner in which he ought to mend his ways with regard to his future advances towards his wife.

But the presence of this clause does handicap him in the making of those advances, and I agree that having regard to what has happened since the order was made it is now desirable that the non-cohabitation clause should be removed.

Factory—Common law duty—Relevance of regulations.

The plaintiff, a highly skilled miller, was working on a metal milling machine which consisted of an unguarded cutting wheel revolving rapidly in a vertical plane and bearing upon the metal bar to be machined which was fixed by a clamp at each end, the clamps being mounted upon a turn-table underneath the cutter. The machine was set so that the cutter automatically rose and fell as it cut while traversing across the bar, a process called profiling. When the plaintiff had in this way automatically profiled a metal bar at one end he swivelled the turn-table preparatory to carrying out the same process upon the other end, and found it necessary to readjust the bar in the clamps. He pressed the button to stop the cutting wheel, but unknown to him he failed to push it in far enough to operate the switch, and the very little noise made by the still revolving cutter was inaudible to him because of the noise from the other machinery. The plaintiff moved to a position opposite the centre of the turn-table and as he did so he looked towards another man working another machine and to whom he wanted to give a message. While still looking at the other man, he put both hands over the bar with the result that two fingers of his left hand were injured by the unguarded revolving cutter:—

Held, (1) that, on the facts, the machine in question was a horizontal milling machine to which the Horizontal Milling Machine Regulations, 1928, applied; that as the machine was being used for automatic profiling it was exempted from the requirements of regulation 3, requiring cutters of such machines to be fenced; and that the proviso to the exemptions only ensured that the provisions of section 14 of the Factories Act, 1937,[1] were applied in respect of any dangerous part of the machine other than the cutter; accordingly, the defendant company were relieved from their statutory duty to fence the cutter.

ACTION.

On May 23, 1952, the plaintiff, who was employed by the defendant company as a fitter and miller at their factory, was working at a metal milling machine, reconditioning carding flats or bars used in the cotton spinning industry, when he was injured.

The machine had a cutter which revolved at a fast speed in a vertical plane and was mounted at the end of a horizontal spindle. The bar to be trued was held at each end in a clamp set upon a turn-table and each clamp had an adjustable jaw, controlled by a screw. The bar was placed upon the clamps and the clamps and the position of the bar upon them was so adjusted as to bring the surface to be milled precisely under the cutter, and when the work upon one end of the bar was done the turn-table was revolved so as to bring the other end of the bar under the cutter.

The movements of the cutter were controlled by two press buttons which were in a switch-box let into the front of the machine, and also by a knob in front of the machine above the switch-box.

The plaintiff had milled the surface at one end of a bar and when he swung the turn-table to bring the other end of the bar into position the bar did not swing into proper place and needed re-setting. He pressed the right hand button, intending to stop the cutter revolving, and moved to a position opposite the centre of the turn-table. As he did so he looked towards another man working another machine, and to whom he wanted to give a message. While he was still looking at the other man, the plaintiff put both hands over the bar. Unknown to him, the cutter was still revolving for he had not pushed the press button far enough in to operate the switch, and in reaching towards the screw with his left hand he put his fingers in the cutter. As a result the little and ring fingers of his left hand were so severely injured that the two end joints of each finger had to be amputated.

The plaintiff brought this action against the defendant

" as to be as safe to every person em- " ployed or working on the premises " as it would be if securely fenced: " Provided that, in so far as the safety " of a dangerous part of any machi- " nery cannot by reason of the nature " of the operation be secured by means " of a fixed guard, the requirements " of this subsection shall be deemed to " have been complied with if a device " is provided which automatically " prevents the operator from coming " into contact with that part."

company claiming damages for breach of statutory duty and at common law.

J. R. Crichton Q.C. and Robert Lambert for the plaintiff.
J. D. Cantley Q.C. and W. D. T. Hodgson for the defendants.

In addition to the cases referred to in the judgment the following case was cited in argument: Franklin v. Gramophone Co. Ltd.[2]

GLYN-JONES J. delivered a considered judgment in which after setting out the facts he continued: Mr. Crichton, for the plaintiff, contends that the revolving cutter was a dangerous part of the machine and that there was a statutory duty laid upon the defendant company by section 14 of the Factories Act, 1937, to keep it securely fenced. Mr. Cantley, for the defendants, says that this machine was a horizontal milling machine and that the obligation securely to fence the cutter has been modified by the Horizontal Milling Machine Regulations, 1928, and that compliance with the regulations relieves the defendant company from any obligation imposed by section 14 of the Factories Act, 1937, in respect of the fencing or guarding of the cutter. He relies on the decision of the Court of Appeal in Miller v. Wm. Boothman & Sons Ltd.,[1] which concerned a woodworking machine with a circular saw. [His Lordship found that the machine was a horizontal milling machine and continued:]

There is a resemblance between the cutter of a horizontal milling machine and a circular saw, which was the subject matter in Miller v. Boothman.[1] The resemblance lies in this: that in respect of most of the work to be done there must be a gap in any guard through which the component to be milled can reach the cutter, and if the gap is large enough for the component to pass through it will also be large enough to admit the fingers of the operator. If this is so then it is in practice impossible to use a horizontal milling machine for most of the work for which it is designed without committing a breach of section 14 and there is, therefore, as good a ground for modifying the absolute obligation imposed by statute in the case of a cutter of a horizontal milling machine as there is in the case of a circular saw.

Regulation 3 of the Horizontal Milling Machine Regulations, 1928 (S.R. & O., 1928, No. 548), reads as follows: "The cutter or "cutters of every horizontal milling machine shall be fenced by "a strong guard, properly adjusted to the work, which shall "enclose the whole cutting surface except such part as is neces-"sarily exposed for the milling operations." I call attention to the words: "except such part as is necessarily exposed for the "milling operations". A definition of the shape and dimensions of a guard follows. Regulation 6 provides: "The guards or other "appliances required by these Regulations shall be maintained "in an efficient state and shall be constantly kept in position "while the milling cutter is in motion, except when the tool "setter is setting up the machine." To regulation 3 there is the following exemption: "Nothing in Regulation 3 shall apply to "any milling cutter used on (i) a spindle which exceeds $2\frac{1}{2}$ "inches in diameter, or arbor which exceeds 2 inches in diameter "at the place where the cutter is mounted: or when used for "(ii) (a) making tools, jigs, or gauges for use in the factory, or "(b) similarly accurate operations where, during the actual "cutting process, all those parts of the machine which control "the relative positions of the work and the cutter can be "manipulated by the operator at his unrestricted discretion." There follow descriptions of a number of other processes, one of which, under (vii), is automatic profiling, which is the process being carried on in this case and therefore is one of the processes to which the exemption applies.

Mr. Cantley says that the regulations taken as a whole define exhaustively the duty of the occupier of a factory in respect of the fencing of the cutter, but Mr. Crichton contends that a horizontal milling machine used for automatic profiling, being exempted from the regulations, continues to be governed by section 14 of the Factories Act, 1937. He says that regulation 3 grants to the occupier of a factory some modification of the stringency of the duty imposed by section 14, but in respect of the exempted processes the same privilege or modification is not conceded; and he says that his contention is expressly supported by a proviso to the exemption which reads as follows: "Provided "that these exemptions shall not prejudice the application of "section 10 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, [now "section 14 of the Factories Act, 1937] in regard to fencing of "such machinery."

I was given descriptions of most of these processes and it is quite clear that the process described under exemption (ii), for example, is one which cannot possibly be carried on if the whole of the cutter must be securely fenced or guarded so as to satisfy the requirements of section 14, and I think it would be odd if the effect of exempting the occupier from the requirements of regulation 3 had the effect of prohibiting the use of horizontal milling machines for one or more—perhaps all—of the exempted processes. That is what the effect would be if Mr. Crichton is right.

I think that some clue to the purpose of the regulations can be afforded if one supposes that regulations 3 and 6 are intended to apply to repetition work. The machine is set, when the cutters are unguarded, by a skilled toolsetter, and after the machine has been set the guard is put into position and the machine operator, not necessarily highly skilled, carries on with the repetition work until the next occasion when the machine wants setting. To that end the only modification of the absolute duty imposed by section 14—and it is the modification which makes it practicable to work the machine—is that such part of the cutter as is necessarily exposed to the milling operation may be left unguarded and the whole of the rest of the cutter must be securely and properly fenced or covered.

Quinn v. Horsfall and Bickham Ltd.

Of the processes described in the exemptions some are obviously processes which have to be carried on by highly skilled men. That would be true of the process described in exemption (ii), and I think myself that it is also true of the process that was being carried on in this case, namely automatic profiling. It is quite obvious, I think, that, in the carrying on of that process, it is necessary for the machine to be very frequently readjusted and reset and for the operator to use a high degree of skill. I think that, while there may have been other reasons why some of these exemptions have been made, in respect at any rate of the process described in exemptions (ii) and (vii), and probably in respect of some of the other processes also it may well be that the reason for the exemption is that the skilled man may more safely be given a freedom which is not given to the more or less unskilled machine operator employed on repetition work. I think that the meaning to be given to the proviso is that it ensures that the requirements of section 14 of the Factories Act, 1937, are applied in respect of any dangerous part of the machine other than the cutter.

That seems to me to follow from the conclusion reached by the Court of Appeal in Benn v. Kamm & Co. Ltd.[2] It is true that that case differs from this one in that the process being carried on there was one, I think, to which regulation 3 applied: it was not one of the exempted processes. There the operator was adjusting or setting the machine when he was injured, not by the cutter, but by another part of the machine altogether, and the argument there was that the regulations are an exhaustive definition of the obligation imposed on an occupier to fence the machine or any part of it: in other words, if an occupier complied with the regulations by fencing the cutter to the extent required by the regulations he was under no obligation to fence anything else. The Court of Appeal did not agree with that view and held that the operation of these regulations was limited to the cutter of the machine, and that for any other dangerous part the duty of the occupier must be sought in section 14 of the Factories Act, 1937. It is perhaps worthy of note that the operator in that case was an apprentice of 19 who could certainly not be said to be a highly skilled man, whereas the kind of process being done in the present case by the plaintiff was being done by a man of a very high degree of skill.

In Benn v. Kamm[2] the Court of Appeal reached the conclusion that the provisions of section 14 applied to dangerous parts of the machine other than the cutter, although there is no proviso to regulation 3 of the regulations which expressly deals with the matter. One might well reach the same conclusion concerning an exempted process even if no proviso were there. In a sense, therefore, to give this meaning to the proviso deprives it of much, if any, effect, but I prefer to construe it as inserted for the removal of doubt rather than as a devious method of prohibiting such a process as that described in exemption (ii). I have come to the conclusion that there was no statutory duty upon the defendant company to fence this cutter. I think that the effect of the regulations is to relieve them from the statutory obligation to fence it.

[His Lordship considered alleged breaches of other statutory obligations and held that want of suitable lighting was not a cause of the accident; that the stopping appliance was efficient and in a proper position; and as regarded the first allegation of negligence at common law, that the clamping screw was placed dangerously near the cutter, he held that the defendants were negligent. The second allegation, which his Lordship allowed by amendment of the particulars of negligence, was that the defendant company, being well aware that their employees were using the machine with the hinged guard up, should have insisted that they used the guard wherever possible. His Lordship continued:] The question raised by the other allegation is, I think, a more difficult one. Mr. Cantley says that it would be harsh indeed and quite unjust to say that an employer notwithstanding that he has performed the duty imposed upon him by Parliament—by regulations made by statutory power granted by Parliament—should have imposed upon him by common law a duty to do something which Parliament has said he need not do. Mr. Cantley's argument is that once Parliament makes regulations concerning the circumstances in which a particular machine must be fenced, these regulations are an exhaustive definition of the employer's duty and supersede, as it were, the common law.

I have come to the conclusion that that is not the right view. Supposing that the Factory Act and its regulations had not been passed, the common law, in my opinion, would have required the employer to take reasonable care to protect his servants from unnecessary danger by fencing or guarding any part of the machine at which the employee was required to work—any part which was dangerous and which it was reasonably practicable to fence. The common law never imposed an absolute obligation, but may well impose an obligation to fence where it is reasonably practicable to do so. I think the truth is that the common law obligation to fence is masked by the wider obligations imposed by statute, and that if for any reason the wider statutory obligation disappears then the common law duty once more becomes visible resting where it always has done—on the shoulders of the employer. I think that notwithstanding these regulations, if a reasonable employer in the circumstances would have thought it was his duty, by giving directions to his workpeople or perhaps merely by exhortation, to encourage the use of a guard so as to diminish the risk, then there is a breach of common law duty if he fails to do so.

Quinn v. Horsfall and Bickham Ltd.

Glyn-Jones J.

Therefore I have to consider whether a reasonable employer would have taken any steps beyond those actually taken by the defendant company in the present case to discourage the men from working with the guard up. Although, as I say, I do not think the existence of the regulations relieves the occupier from any common law duty to fence, the fact that the regulations exist is a fact to be considered in assessing whether or not a reasonable employer would think it necessary to interfere. [His Lordship reviewed the evidence and found that the employers were not guilty of negligence.]

Husband and Wife—Desertion—Termination—Petitioner's adultery during period of desertion—Previous objection by respondent to association—Association broken until after inception of desertion—Respondent aware of adultery—Respondent's conduct not affected by adultery.

A husband presented a petition for divorce on the ground that his wife, whom he had married in 1920, had deserted him in February, 1951, when she left the matrimonial home. He prayed for the exercise of the court's discretion in respect of his adultery since the summer of 1953 with a woman with whom he had been living and whom he wished to marry. He had been on very friendly terms with that woman in 1945 and 1946, and his wife had objected to the association, which was broken off. The friendship was renewed at the end of 1952 when the woman became his housekeeper.

When the wife deserted the husband she went to share a caravan with another man; but a petition presented by the husband in April, 1952, on the ground of adultery was dismissed in April, 1953, in a defended suit. Shortly afterwards, before the husband began to commit adultery, she unsuccessfully applied for an order of the justices on the ground of neglect to maintain. In both those proceedings she made it clear that she suspected an adulterous relationship between the husband and his housekeeper; and it was established that she was aware of the adultery after it in fact began. She continued to share the caravan with the man previously named as co-respondent:—

Held, (1) that, notwithstanding the wife's knowledge of the adultery, and her previous protests at the time of the earlier association between her husband and the woman concerned, she had shown by her conduct when she left that she was indifferent to her husband's behaviour thereafter with other women. Her conduct as a deserter had not been affected by her knowledge of the adultery, and the desertion alleged had accordingly been proved.

(2) That it was a proper case for the exercise of the court's discretion, and that a decree nisi should be pronounced accordingly.

Williams v. Williams [1943] 2 All E.R. 746 distinguished.

UNDEFENDED PETITION for divorce on the ground of desertion.

The following statement of facts is substantially taken from the judgment: The parties were married in July, 1920, and finally separated in early 1951, when the wife left the husband. The husband, when serving in the Royal Air Force during the war, had met a woman who was at that time a widow, her first husband having been killed in 1940 at Dunkirk. The husband and the woman became very attached to each other; but in April, 1945, she married one Mepham, and the husband was best man at that wedding. That marriage was, however, very short-lived; and in 1948 Mepham obtained a decree of dissolution against his wife on the ground of her desertion of him very soon after their marriage.

In 1945 or 1946 there was an attachment between the husband and Mrs. Mepham. The wife intercepted a letter from Mrs. Mepham to him in or about 1946, which was only one of many. The letter was of an affectionate nature which she resented, and her anxieties as to the relations between her husband and Mrs. Mepham were not diminished by a somewhat angry letter written in September, 1946, by Mepham to the present petitioner in the following terms: "Hallo, Fred, my double-crossing pal "what does it feel like to be chief witness (co-respondent) in a "divorce case?" He made various threats and finished in these terms: "Will be seeing you very shortly. From one who "just ain't gonna forget," and signed "Mr. Mepham." Mepham was therefore taking a serious view of his wife's relations with the husband in the present suit. That letter was also intercepted by the wife, and the court was satisfied that she had every cause to question her husband. The court, however, found upon the evidence that the friendship was broken off, that the correspondence ceased, and that they did not see each other again until some months after the wife had left the husband in February, 1951. The husband, in fact, had not known where Mrs. Mepham was in the autumn of 1951, and found her only after he had caused inquiries to be made by an inquiry agent on his behalf.

The wife had said in the earlier proceedings referred to below that she was complaining from time to time not of the husband's association with Mrs. Mepham, which had ceased in 1946, but because when there was other trouble between them the husband used to say to his wife how infinitely preferable Mrs. Mepham was. The final trouble between the parties arose out of the wife's friendship and affection for a Pole called Horbacz, who had originally come as a lodger to the house. In February, 1951, the wife left the husband, having sold up a portion of the household furniture, took with her her personal belongings, went for a short time, of a few weeks, to lodgings, and then set up house with Horbacz in a caravan in Hemel Hempstead, where the court found that they had resided ever since. The husband learned that the wife was living in the caravan with this man, to whom he had objected from time to time, and in April, 1952, he presented a petition for dissolution of marriage in which he alleged that the respondent wife had committed adultery with Horbacz, whom he named as co-respondent. The matter was tried for several days, in April, 1953, by Mr. Commissioner Latey who, having heard the evidence, came to the conclusion that the husband had not proved his case and dismissed that petition. Immediately after that the wife summoned the husband before the justices for wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for her; that summons was dismissed in 1953. The husband's adultery began very shortly afterwards.

T. J. Kelly for the husband.

Richards v. Richards [1] was referred to in argument in addition to the cases cited in the judgment.

Karminski J. This is a petition by a husband, Alfred James Parrock, in which he prays for the dissolution of his marriage with the respondent wife, Lilian Parrock, on the ground that she has deserted him for three years and upwards immediately preceding the presentation of the petition. The husband says that the wife left him on February 27, 1951, taking her personal belongings with her, and that she has since refused to live with him again. The husband has to ask for the exercise of the discretion of the court because he himself has committed adultery, as set out in his discretion statement, with Mrs. Mepham.

When the case first came before me, I was a good deal troubled by the position created by the husband's own admitted adultery, because as he said in his discretion statement, and as he has repeated on oath in this court, he has in effect been living in adultery with Mrs. Mepham from about the middle of the year 1953 right up to the present time. Mrs. Mepham had been his housekeeper from December, 1952, but it is not suggested, and it certainly is not admitted by the husband, that adultery commenced until about six months after she first came to his house as his housekeeper. There have been other proceedings between these parties which in no way diminish the difficulties of the court in deciding whether or not, first of all, desertion had ever commenced; and, if it had commenced, whether it had continued up till the time of the petition at the end of 1954, notwithstanding the petitioner's own admitted adultery.

[His Lordship then stated the facts and continued:] The husband now says that the wife has deserted him. The wife has not appeared or taken any part in these proceedings, but the relevant facts having been brought to my notice I felt it was a case where I should have assistance from the Queen's Proctor, certainly as to the law and, if necessary, as to the facts.

Mr. Colin Duncan appears for the Queen's Proctor and I am indebted to him for his careful argument on both facts and law. He has told me that the Queen's Proctor has made what I may term the usual inquiries and has discovered no grounds for intervening. As to the law, I think the law on this difficult subject of desertion where the petitioner has committed adultery is now tolerably well-established. The leading case on this subject is Herod v. Herod,[1] where the considered judgment of Lord Merriman P. is accurately summarized in the headnote, which reads: "If a spouse commits adultery after he or she has been "deserted, the desertion is not necessarily terminated as a matter "of law, regardless of the question whether the deserting spouse "knew of the adultery or whether it had any influence on his or "her conduct. If it is left in doubt whether the respondent knew "of the adultery or, if known, whether his or her conduct was "affected by it, the petitioner would fail to discharge the burden "of proof. The question is to be determined according to the "circumstances of each case. A spouse cannot be heard to say "that adultery at which he or she has connived or to which his "or her conduct has conduced is a reasonable cause for deser-"tion." This statement of the law, laid down in Herod v. Herod,[1] was subsequently approved by the Court of Appeal in Earnshaw v. Earnshaw.[2]

Mr. Duncan has rightly pointed out that the law in Scotland is different, and that, indeed, the House of Lords decided that in Scotland a pursuer who has committed adultery within three years, is in no circumstances entitled to obtain a decree of divorce: Marshall (or Wilkinson) v. Wilkinson.[3] But an examination of the judgments in that case makes clear that there their Lordships were dealing with the law of Scotland as it was in 1943, and as, in the view of the majority of their Lordships, it had been since the Act of 1573. No query appears to have been raised in that case by their Lordships as to the correctness or otherwise of the decision of Herod v. Herod,[4] which was referred to in argument and was also mentioned in the speech of Lord

Karminski J.

Simon L.C.,[5] where it was quoted with apparent approval. But English law is clear to this extent at least, that adultery by a petitioner within three years of the desertion which he alleges does not preclude him from establishing such desertion.

Mr. Colin Duncan called my attention to the decision of the Court of Appeal in Williams v. Williams.[7] In that case the facts were somewhat different from the present in that the husband had greatly upset the wife in 1938 by staying for a number of nights with a young woman in hotels in London and Brighton, a fact which, when it came to the wife's notice, not unnaturally caused her to wonder and indeed to suspect that her husband had committed adultery with that woman. It was found that no adultery had in fact been committed in 1938 by the husband with that young woman, but that in 1939 till the end of 1941 he had, in fact, gone off with the same young woman and had committed adultery with her. In 1942 he filed a petition for divorce on the ground that his wife had deserted him for three years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition, and the wife took no part in those proceedings and did not defend them. On the facts, Henn Collins J., who was trying the case at first instance, dismissed the petition and the matter came to the Court of Appeal, where the decision of Henn Collins J. was affirmed. The peculiar feature of that case, and which, perhaps, distinguishes it from the present, was that the wife had persuaded herself that adultery had been committed in 1938 although, in fact, it had not. But when the husband sought to rely on that he was met with the answer that his subsequent adultery must have had some effect upon the wife's mind. I think that the matter can be most conveniently summarized by a brief reference to the judgment of du Parcq L.J.[8]: "The question is whether, "because of her firm refusal to justify her desertion of her "husband by anything subsequent to the events of 1938, it can "be said with reasonable certainty that what happened later "made no difference to her conduct. For myself, I find it "impossible to say that, if the petitioner had kept aloof from "Miss Hooper for a longer period, and if he had persevered in "his attempts at reconciliation, or continued to desire it, for as "long as even one year out of the statutory period of three "years, his wife would still have refused inexorably to receive "him back. No one can say with certainty either that she "would, or that she would not, have relented, and it is after "all the act of the petitioner which has made it impossible to "give a certain answer."

The burden in cases of this kind must always be on the petitioner who has been committing adultery to satisfy the court of the matters required in Herod v. Herod,[9] that the respondent either did not know that adultery had been committed, or that,

[5] 1943 S.C. (H.L.) 61, 66.
[7] [1943] 2 All E.R. 746.
[8] Ibid. 572.
[9] [1939] P. 11.

if that knowledge was present to the respondent's mind, he was quite uninfluenced by it in his decision to remain apart and not return to the petitioner spouse.

The difference between the present case and the facts in Williams v. Williams [10] is this: in Williams v. Williams [10] the wife who was the respondent could not in any way be attacked because of her matrimonial conduct apart from the alleged desertion. It was not suggested, as it is here, that she had gone to live against the wishes of her husband in a caravan with another man under circumstances which might not unreasonably arouse the suspicion that adultery had been committed in that caravan. In the present case, the wife did so withdraw herself from cohabitation to start life in a caravan although, as Mr. Commissioner Latey found, she did not commit adultery there.

I have to consider this case, as Herod v. Herod [11] says I must, in the light of all the circumstances known to the court. So far as the respondent's knowledge in this case is concerned, I think it is tolerably clear that she knew that her husband was living in the same house, with Mrs. Mepham as his housekeeper; and she made her suspicions that adultery was quite probably being committed clear both at the trial before Mr. Commissioner Latey, and subsequently before the justices. On the facts as I know them now, the adultery did not commence until almost immediately after the wife's proceedings before the justices had been dismissed. I have no reason to doubt the accuracy of the petitioner's evidence on that, the more especially since the Queen's Proctor has been good enough to investigate the facts and has not found anything which he thinks ought to be brought to the court's notice on those matters. The wife lived, and still lives, in the same town of Hemel Hempstead as the petitioner does, and it is improbable under all the circumstances that the wife was at any rate free from suspicions as to what was going on between her husband and Mrs. Mepham. It would, indeed, be strange if some friend or acquaintance had not told her what was going on, and the petitioner as early as 1951, when he had resumed his acquaintance with Mrs. Mepham, made a quite frank disclosure to the married daughter of himself and the respondent when he told that daughter that he was in love with Mrs. Mepham and hoped one day to be able to marry her. I have no doubt whatsoever that the reason for these proceedings is because he and Mrs. Mepham do in fact want to marry. I have equally no doubt that the respondent wife knew that the husband was living with Mrs. Mepham not merely under the same roof as employer and housekeeper but as lover and mistress. She has taken no part in defending these proceedings. That may have some, but not much, significance; but it certainly does not relieve me of my obligations to decide this case in the light of the wife's knowledge and of her attitude. I do not think myself, having now had the opportunity of considering the facts and the law with the great assistance of the Queen's Proctor, that the wife was affected by the knowledge of her husband's adultery, which I find as a fact she had. I think this is a case where, confronted with charges against herself, she not unnaturally counter-attacked not only in this court before Mr. Commissioner Latey, but also before the justices, and pointing out that her husband's conduct in the past was by no means free from blame.

I have not had in this case the advantage of any evidence from the wife, but I am satisfied that I have had read to me all the relevant passages of evidence which she gave before the commissioner and also the note of the evidence which she gave before the justices at Berkhamsted. Mr. Commissioner Latey, who had the advantage of seeing her in the witness-box for some time, found her to be in some matters an unreliable witness, and I have to try and decide this case in her absence.

In my view this is a case where the wife, perhaps because she was tired of her marriage and of her husband, and perhaps because she had a good deal of affection for Horbacz, decided to leave her husband and to set up home in this caravan. Once she decided to do that I do not think that the wife really cared at all whether Mrs. Mepham, originally the housekeeper, subsequently became the petitioner's mistress. I think that the wife was quite indifferent to what went on in the husband's home, or what the husband did with other women once she had gone to set up house with Horbacz. Having satisfied myself as well as I can of what went on in the mind of a woman whom I have not seen in the witness-box, I think that my duty is clear. This has not been an easy case, and it has not been made very much easier by a certain reluctance on the part of the petitioner to give away anything in evidence which he thought might injure his case, whereas my own task would have been infinitely easier had he been a rather more candid witness. But I think, or more accurately I hope, that I have now found where the truth lies. In my view, for the reasons I have given, I am satisfied that the petitioner has proved the contents of his petition. This is a case where I think it is right that the court's discretion should be exercised in the petitioner's favour if only to enable him, if he so desires, to marry Mrs. Mepham. I therefore pronounce a decree nisi on the prayer of the petition on the ground of desertion.

Lord Merriman P. and Collingwood J.

Husband and Wife — Desertion — Constructive desertion — Reasonable belief in adultery — Justices — Practice — Specific allegation and notice of adultery not necessary—Nature of case of reasonable belief required.

At the hearing of a wife's summons on the ground of desertion the wife alleged that she had left the matrimonial home in the reasonable belief, induced by the husband's conduct, that he had committed adultery. Before the hearing the wife's solicitors, by certain letters to those representing the husband, gave notice of specific adultery to be alleged. The justices held that the adultery had not been proved, but that the husband was guilty of desertion. On the husband's appeal:—

Held, that a specific allegation of adultery should not be made unless it was intended to make an actual charge of adultery; in the present case it would have been appropriate and sufficient to give notice that the wife intended to rely on a reasonable belief that adultery had been committed at the time and in the circumstances specified, in other words, to state the substance of her case.

Frampton v. Frampton [1951] W.N. 250 and Jones v. Jones [1954] 1 W.L.R. 1474; [1954] 3 All E.R. 476n. explained.

APPEAL from an order of the justices for the City and County of Bristol.

The wife left the matrimonial home on September 23, 1955, and issued a summons on the ground of the husband's desertion. It was, therefore, necessary for her to justify her leaving by showing that, in effect, she had been expelled by her husband's conduct. This she sought to do by asserting that she left in the reasonable belief, induced by the husband's conduct, that he had committed adultery. In that connexion she relied on certain events which occurred between Thursday, September 15, 1955, and the discovery on Sunday, September 18, 1955, of certain stains on the husband's clothing by the wife. There was no formal complaint of adultery. The complaint was one of desertion on September 23, 1955.

On October 26, 1955, her solicitors wrote to the husband's solicitors asking them to accept their letter as notice that they intended, on behalf of the wife, to allege that the husband had committed adultery with a woman unknown on Friday, September 16, 1955. By a further letter of October 31, 1955, the date was corrected, but only the date, for the husband's solicitors were invited to note that it should have been alleged that adultery had been committed with a woman unknown on Saturday, September 17, 1955, not Friday, September 16, 1955, as had been stated in the letter of October 26, 1955; but it was still an allegation that adultery had been committed. Finally, on November 25, 1955, the particulars of adultery were again corrected in a letter from the wife's solicitors to those of the husband in which they said: "In view of the nature of the "evidence on which we must rely it would be improper to "specify any particular date on which adultery was committed, "and we therefore feel that we must give a fresh notice of "allegation (sic) in substitution of the one dated the 31st"—(that is the correction to Saturday the 17th)—"to read 'adultery "'with a woman unknown shortly before the discovery of the "'stains and blood on Mr. Sullivan's outer- and under-clothing "'on the morning of Sunday the 18th September.'"

Sullivan v. Sullivan.

On November 29, 1955, the justices for the City and County of Bristol found the charge of adultery against the husband was not proved and made an order in favour of the wife on the ground of the husband's desertion. From this order the husband appealed.

R. A. Macdonald for the husband.
W. M. Huntley for the wife.

Lord Merriman P. referred to the facts substantially as set out above, and continued: Short of an actual formal complaint, it would be difficult to imagine a plainer charge of adultery on a specified or at least an ascertainable date, albeit it was not with a specific woman but alleged to be with a woman unknown, and, moreover, in their reasons, the justices say that it was admitted that written notice had been given to the husband of the wife's intention to allege that he had committed adultery. However, the justices said that they were not satisfied that adultery had been proved, while, at the same time, they found that the wife had reasonable grounds at the time for so believing, and that such belief was induced by the husband's conduct.

In one phase of the argument Mr. Huntley, for the wife, submitted that there had been no determination adverse to the wife of the issue whether the husband had in fact committed adultery, because adultery was not the subject of her formal complaint, and that the notices to which I have just referred were given because of what was stated to be the universal practice to give notice of a charge of adultery whenever adultery was mentioned in any form whatever.

I do not in the least degree retract from the decision of this court in Duffield v. Duffield,[1] in which I am reported as saying[2]: ". . . I wish to emphasise, as has been emphasised repeatedly, "to my knowledge, by this court, that it is of the utmost "importance that whenever a charge of adultery is going to be "made, in whatever context, under the summary jurisdiction "procedure, full and proper particulars should be given," but I repeat that the words were "whenever a charge of adultery is "going to be made." The point is, of course, that a charge of adultery may be made in more than one context, for example—(and these are not necessarily intended to be exhaustive)—as a bar to the jurisdiction of the court under section 6 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, as a ground for revoking an order under section 7 of the Act, as a defence to a charge of desertion, or as ground for substantive relief at the instance of either the husband or the wife.

But there is an essential difference between making a charge of adultery and alleging that the conduct of one spouse or the other has induced a reasonable belief that adultery has been committed. In my opinion, a specific allegation of adultery should not be made merely as a matter of course unless it is intended to make the actual charge of adultery. In this case it would have been appropriate and sufficient to give notice that the wife intended to rely, in support of the charge of desertion, on a reasonable belief that adultery had been committed at the time and in the circumstances specified; in other words, to state the substance of her case. I think that this is the true effect of the decisions of this court in Frampton v. Frampton [3] and Jones v. Jones [4]; but I am saying what I am in deference to Mr. Huntley's statement that there is a practice which is supposed to necessitate the making of a charge of adultery merely because the charge of reasonable belief in adultery is being put forward, whether by way of defence or as the case may be. Therefore it is desirable, I think, that the matter should be brought back to where it is left in Jones v. Jones,[5] to which I have made reference, namely, that what is required is a correct statement of what is the substance of the wife's case, but that adultery should not be charged merely as a matter of course.

[His Lordship then, considering Allen v. Allen [6]; West v. West [7] and Everitt v. Everitt,[8] held that, when the two issues of adultery and reasonable belief by one party in that adultery, induced by the conduct of the other spouse, came to be determined by the same court at the same hearing, the negativing of the charge of adultery did not operate retrospectively to negative the existence of the reasonable belief in that adultery. He also held that it was impossible to say that the acts put forward in support of the reasonable belief remained the same throughout up to the moment of the justices' decision since the justices had had the benefit of evidence upon the matter which was not available to the wife when she formed her belief in the husband's adultery. It was, therefore, plainly open to the justices, while finding that the adultery was not proved, to hold that, at the time when the wife left the matrimonial home, she believed that the husband had committed adultery and had reasonable grounds, induced by his conduct, for so doing. On an application under section 7 (3) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, for the removal of a disqualification for holding a driving licence for three years from April 27, 1954, justices ordered its removal as from April 27, 1956. The applicant subsequently applied for the immediate removal of the disqualification on the ground of hardship. The justices were of opinion that they had no jurisdiction to hear the application, since the previous application had been granted, and that further applications could only be made if a previous application had been refused:—

Held, that the justices had jurisdiction to hear the second application.

Application for mandamus.

On April 27, 1954, the applicant, Roy Gaynor, was convicted by the Manchester justices of driving to the danger of the public contrary to section 11 (1) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, and was fined £20 and disqualified from driving motor-vehicles for three years from the date of conviction. On August 31, 1955, the applicant sought to make a further application for the immediate removal of the disqualification on the ground that he had additional evidence to show that irretrievable hardship would be caused to him by the continuance of the disqualification. The justices refused to allow the application to be made on the ground that they had no jurisdiction to hear it, since the previous application had been granted, and further applications could only be made if a previous application had been refused. Vagrancy—Prostitution—Living on the earnings of prostitution—Flats let at increased rents to individual prostitutes for the purposes of prostitution—Vagrancy Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 39), s. 1 (1).

Four male persons were alleged to have let flats to individual prostitutes, knowing that they were to be used for the purposes of prostitution, and to have received an increased rent on that account. Four other male persons were alleged to have conducted an estate agency, the main business of which was to provide and let flats to individual prostitutes for the purposes of prostitution:—

Held, that the facts alleged did not constitute the offence charged of living wholly or in part on the earnings of prostitution contrary to section 1 (1) of the Vagrancy Act, 1898.

Trial on indictment.

Bernard Silver, Cyril William Pullinger, Maurice Blair, George Modebadze, Wilfred Jerome Delmaine, Robert Edward Clement, Robert Laurent Falzon and Patrick Wilkinson were charged on indictment that they, being male persons, did, unlawfully and knowingly, live wholly or in part on the earnings of prostitution, contrary to section 1 (1) of the Vagrancy Act, 1898.[1] The ninth defendant, Albertine Falzon, was charged with aiding and abetting the other defendants to commit the offence with which they were charged.

The Crown alleged that the defendants Pullinger, Blair, Modebadze and Clement were landlords of Soho flats which would normally carry a rent of £3 to £5 a week, but which were let to individual prostitutes at rents as high as £25 a week. In addition, it was alleged, the women had to pay £200 key money. The other defendants were concerned in running an estate agency in Romilly Street, Soho, which the Crown alleged dealt with virtually nothing but providing and letting flats to prostitutes. From the 24 flats involved in the case it was alleged that rents totalling £26,000 a year were paid by the women. There was no evidence that any of the defendants were living with or habitually in the company of any of the prostitutes or had exercised control, direction or influence over the movements of any of them so as to bring subsection (3) of section 1 of the Vagrancy Act, 1898,[1] into operation.

All the defendants pleaded not guilty.

HIS HONOUR JUDGE MAUDE Q.C. Members of the jury, the Queen's courts can only administer the law as they find it, and they must, and I must, administer it strictly. Any feeling of indignation which the general public or the judiciary might have at a state of affairs that would appear to be grossly immoral is irrelevant unless the facts show that an offence has been committed against the existing law. I have come to the conclusion, having heard the evidence for the Crown, that within the law as it stands at the present time there is no case for these persons in the dock to answer. This is a matter which may be considered of some public importance and I think it is right that I should set out the reasons for coming to that conclusion.

At first sight it might appear, in ordinary language, clear that all the persons in the dock were knowingly living in part on the earnings of prostitution. But when the position is more carefully considered it can be seen that this is not so. The common law has always known how to deal with what are called brothels, that is to say, places where two or more women in the same premises are plying their trade as prostitutes. That, you understand, is different from premises, such as those in this case, where only one woman is operating. In 1885 the scope of the criminal law relating to these matters was widened by section 13 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885.[1] It is noticeable that the tenant, lessee, or occupier of any such premises is covered by one subsection while the lessor or landlord, or the agent of the lessor or landlord, is dealt with by a different subsection. So that the lessor or landlord was committing an offence if he knowingly let the premises or any part thereof to be used as a brothel, whereas the tenant, lessee, or occupier could be punished not only for permitting the premises to be used as a brothel but also for permitting them to be used for the purposes of habitual prostitution. One must be certain that the distinction between the lessor and the landlord on the one hand and the tenant, lessee, or occupier on the other hand was of importance to Parliament.

That being the position in 1885, it is quite obvious that persons who let their premises for the purposes of habitual prostitution for one prostitute only were impossible to hit; they could not be struck at; only the tenant, lessee or occupier could be. Indeed, a tenant, for instance, who was permitting premises to be used in a way forbidden by section 13 (2) of the Act of 1885 could claim the more privileged position of the lessor landlord if he or she sublet: see Siviour v. Napolitano.[2] Some 13 years passed, and it became clear to Parliament, in 1898, that so far as prostitution was concerned something more needed to be done. It was then made an offence by the Vagrancy Act, 1898, for the first time, to do something quite different, that is to say, knowingly to live wholly or in part on the earnings of prostitution. From 1898 to 1912 no attempt whatsoever was made by the prosecuting authorities to strike at landlords or agents concerned in the letting of premises for prostitution only, as opposed to brothels, by virtue of the Vagrancy Act of 1898; and after the Vagrancy Act had been amended in 1912 until the present time—that is to say, until Regina v. Gorman,[3] a prosecution which was launched at the County of London Sessions on September 8, 1951—no attempt was made to invoke section 1 of the Vagrancy Act of 1898 in the manner in which it has been invoked in this case. So that up to date, so far as is known by the extremely experienced counsel who appear both for the Crown and for the defence or by myself, there has never been any attempt of the kind before 1954. It does not mean because a statute has been allowed to slumber that it is of no effect. If, in fact, it is there, so to speak, as a bit of artillery ready to hand, it can be brought out years, and no doubt maybe hundreds of years, later on and properly used.

The question now arises, for the second time so far as is known, as to what these words mean, that is to say "knowingly "lives wholly or in part on the earnings of prostitution." It might seem, as I say, to those who did not give careful consideration to it that anybody who received money earned by a prostitute would be committing an offence. For instance, the chemist who sells medicines and other things to the prostitute knowing that she is a prostitute would in part be living on the earnings of prostitution, in one sense, the broadest sense; the doctor who attends her, the lawyer who appears for her, if those persons know that she is in fact a prostitute, might appear to be committing an offence. That, of course, cannot be the intention of the Act. If in fact that were so, the state of the prostitute in this world would be simply appalling; she would be able to get no services—or only with the utmost difficulty—and the same would apply to the goods she wanted to buy. It is unthinkable. Therefore, one has to make up one's mind what the Act of 1898 really means.

It has been said in argument before me, by both sides, that the doctor, for instance, who treats the prostitute knowing that she is a prostitute is not really living on her earnings, although of course the money that is handed over is her earnings; what he is doing is, in fact, living on his own earnings; the doctor has earned his money. The shopkeeper, the grocer and the baker and so on, they earn their money. On the one hand, the doctor gives his services, and on the other, in the case of the shopkeepers, they give their goods in exchange for money: they, in fact, are earning their living. They are not, therefore, knowingly living in part on the earnings of prostitution at all. But it is said now—and it is the only instance to which I should be directing my attention—that where a landlord lets his premises for the purpose of prostitution and gets what I propose to call a prostitute rent, a wholly different situation arises; that is to say, in that the ordinary moral rent is less than the prostitute rent, then in fact he is so far as the prostitute rent addition is concerned living on the earnings of prostitution. Now I do not think he is. I think that what the landlord is doing is, he is living on his own earnings, just like the shopkeeper. A shopkeeper who grossly overcharged a prostitute because she was a prostitute would, nevertheless, be living on his own earnings—utterly, completely and disgustingly immoral, but they are his earnings. The doctor earns his money, the barrister earns his money, and the landlord earns his money, and so does the estate agent; they are all earning their money; they are living in part—or wholly, I suppose, although the professional man has other clients—on money that comes from a prostitute, but they are living on those moneys as the earnings of their own profession.

This is an important, clear-cut case where the statements made by some of the defendants reveal with appalling clarity a situation which must according to any standard be utterly immoral, but that does not bring them within this particular Act. I should like to add this. It looks to me as though the reason for this Act not having been used in this way before has been, in substance, that times have simply been changing. What was once in the view of those who were in charge of prosecutions not a serious menace has become one now. The problems of prostitution and how to deal with it are infinitely complicated.

REGINA v. SILVER.
His Honour Judge Maude Q.C.

It is right that every endeavour should be made, through the courts, to test the power of the police. This has now been done and, if my decision is correct, it only remains for Parliament to interfere if it thinks fit. But that is not for me. I should have no feelings about the subject; nor do I feel that I should do anything to indicate that it is my view that this, that or the other should be done. I can see that until these prosecutions had been brought it would be difficult, perhaps, to get Parliament to move in the matter. I do not know whether it may be that something will be done about it. It is a matter for the authorities to consider now as to what is necessary.

The result of all this is that the persons in the dock will now be discharged in one moment. As I say, the conduct of most of them has been utterly and disgustingly immoral. But that is not what I am here for, and that is not what you are here for, members of the jury; we are not a court of morals. I hope that I have done enough to indicate the reasons why it is my duty, sitting here to administer the law, to tell you now that there is no evidence on this indictment which would justify your convicting them of the offences charged, and that your duty is to say in answer to the clerk as to their guilt or otherwise that they are "Not Guilty."

The jury returned a formal verdict of "Not Guilty" in respect of all defendants, and they were discharged.

* HURLSTONE v. HURLSTONE AND ANTONIO.

Husband and Wife—Practice—Appeal—Decree absolute—Application of respondent wife for leave to appeal out of time—Husband's fraudulent conduct alleged—Wife's knowledge of decree nisi—Time and opportunity to appeal—Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1925 (15 & 16 Geo. 5, c. 49), s. 31 (1) (c).

Section 31 (1) of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1925, provides that: "No appeal shall lie . . . (c) from an order absolute "for the dissolution or nullity of marriage in favour of any party "who having had time and opportunity to appeal from the decree "nisi on which the order was founded, has not appealed from that "decree."

A husband, having obtained a decree nisi of divorce on the ground of the wife's admitted adultery, and that decree having been made absolute, married the woman with whom it was alleged he had himself had an adulterous association, although he had not asked in his petition for the exercise of the court's discretion. The wife now asked for leave to appeal out of time. She admittedly had been informed of the granting of the decree nisi, but she alleged that owing to the fraudulent deception of the husband, who had condoned her adultery and had assured her that the decree nisi was a mere formality and that he had abandoned the divorce proceeding, she had not had an opportunity to appeal against the decree nisi before it was made absolute:—

Held, that in the circumstances it was impossible to find that the wife had not had time and opportunity to appeal against the decree and therefore the application must be refused, despite the alleged fraudulent conduct of the husband.

Semble, that there was nothing in section 19 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, which would prevent the court from looking into the whole of the facts of the case in the event of the former wife applying for maintenance.

APPLICATION by a wife for leave to appeal out of time against decrees nisi and absolute of divorce granted in October and December, 1954, respectively, to her then husband.

The facts, as stated by counsel, were as follows: The wife, Mrs. Phyllis Evelyn Hurlstone, had confessed to her husband that she had committed adultery and she asked his forgiveness. He refused and some eight months later filed a petition for divorce. He then wrote to the wife suggesting a reconciliation. This was apparently effected in June, 1954, and the husband persuaded the wife to return the divorce papers, which had been served on her, to his solicitors, together with the acknowledgment of service, assuring her that this was merely a necessary formality, he having abandoned the idea of a divorce. The parties remained on the most friendly terms, sexual intercourse took place between them, and the wife was given to understand that as soon as suitable accommodation had been found cohabitation would be resumed.

In November, 1954, the wife met a friend who told her that she had seen a report of the wife's divorce in a newspaper. Thereupon the wife wrote to an inquiry agent, with whom she had had an interview previously, and he replied informing her that a decree nisi had been pronounced against her but that he understood that that decree had not been made absolute. The wife then taxed her husband with what she had learned and was told by him that the divorce petition had been entirely dropped, that the decree nisi was merely a temporary order of the court which had been made because the parties were not living together, and that it would expire. Believing that assurance the wife had continued in this way of apparent reconciliation with the husband until July, 1955, when by reason of an anonymous letter she discovered that the husband had in December, 1954, married a woman with whom it was alleged he had been carrying on an adulterous association for some considerable time before the alleged reconciliation. He had not asked for the discretion of the court in his petition.

HURLSTONE v. HURLSTONE AND ANTONIO.

In the above circumstances the wife now submitted that owing to the fraudulent conduct of the husband she had been deprived of "time and opportunity" within the meaning of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1925, s. 31 (1) (e) of appealing in time against the making of the decree absolute. She therefore asked for leave to appeal notwithstanding time had expired.

E. Brian Gibbens, for the wife, said she was still interested in retaining her marriage, but if she could not do so she was interested in obtaining a maintenance order against her husband. As the matter stood she would be debarred, in proceedings for maintenance, from alleging her husband's misconduct against her, that not having been raised at the hearing of the divorce proceedings. (See Duchesne v. Duchesne.[1])

The husband did not appear and was not represented.

SINGLETON L.J. I am sorry, but I do not think that this court can accede to the request for leave to appeal notwithstanding that time has expired. I should have liked to do so in one sense, but if we did so, it appears to me, from that which we have been told by Mr. Gibbens and from the documents before us, that there could only be one end to this matter.

Section 31 (1) of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1925, provides: "No appeal shall lie . . . (e) from an order absolute "for the dissolution or nullity of marriage in favour of any "party who, having had time and opportunity to appeal from the "decree nisi on which the order was founded, has not appealed "from that decree."

The decree nisi was granted to the husband, on the ground of the wife's adultery, on October 14, 1954. It is quite clear that some little time later the wife was told by a friend of hers that she had seen her divorce in the paper. The wife then wrote to the inquiry agent with whom she had had some interview earlier, and the inquiry agent wrote on November 22, 1954, telling her that her husband "obtained what is termed a 'decree nisi' on "October 14, 1954, at Hanley Divorce Court. I understand the "decree has not yet been made absolute." On November 27, 1954, the wife wrote to the inquiry agent again: "Thank you "very much for the information you have given me. I would "like this to be kept private and from my husband Thomas "Hurlstone, in case he thinks I'm interfering with his business, "as I'm still good friends with him and would like this kept."

The wife had seen her husband and he had told her something which apparently led her to think that he had dropped the divorce. She had said earlier how she knew from the friend that there had been something in the paper saying that a divorce had been granted against her. She knew from the inquiry agent that a decree nisi had been granted. I cannot see that anyone could successfully argue that she had not had "time and opportunity "to appeal from the decree nisi" before it was made absolute. If that is right, it would be a waste of time and money to give leave to appeal. It is for that reason that I think we are bound to refuse this application.

At the same time I feel sure that Mr. Gibbens is not quite right in saying that the wife's right to maintenance goes. I feel (without having had the matter argued) that that which has been told to us is material on any application for maintenance which she may bring. I do not think that she ought to be cut out from having the whole of these matters put before the one who has to fix the amount of maintenance (if any) which she is granted. It is right, in a case of this kind, that that which we have said should be known. It may, for all I know, come back to this court again. I hope it will not. The application must be refused.

HODSON L.J. I agree. I also agree that, so far as we have investigated the matter, it does not appear that there is anything in section 19 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, which would prevent the court looking into the whole of the facts of this case in the event of this ex-wife making an application for maintenance.

Application refused.

(Amendment No. 2) Ordinance, 1951, "[The Rent Control Board] "shall have power to do all things which it is required or "empowered to do by or under the provisions of the Ordinance, "and in particular shall have power— . . . (n) to exercise juris- "diction in all civil matters and questions arising under this "Ordinance."

Section 5 (1) (n) of the Ordinance does no more than confirm the competence of the board to deal with all civil matters and questions arising under the Ordinance. It does not give to the board the power to determine what civil matters and questions arise under the Ordinance. The board, which has jurisdiction only in issues arising between landlord and tenant, have in any particular case to be satisfied that a relationship of landlord and tenant does exist as a preliminary to bringing the Ordinance into operation, but that is a function merely incidental to the application of any section of the Ordinance that is invoked and not a power conferred by any section of the Ordinance. Accordingly, the question of the relationship of landlord and tenant cannot be made res judicata by a finding of the board if a superior court in subsequent proceedings between the same parties in respect of the same property decides that the facts to constitute that relationship do not exist; the finding of the board on the question of such relationship can never be anything more than a collateral finding which cannot raise a plea of res judicata.

Dictum of Lord Esher M.R. in Regina v. Commissioners for Special Purposes of the Income Tax (1888) 21 Q.B.D. 313, 319; 4 T.L.R. 636 applied.

The Judicial Committee, being of the opinion that the material before them was quite insufficient to establish, on a claim by the respondent to obtain possession of the suit premises, whether the relationship between the respondent and the appellants was one of landlord and tenant or of licensor and licensee (the Supreme Court of Kenya, affirmed by the Eastern Africa Court of Appeal, having held the latter) remitted the case to the Supreme Court to be tried on all issues other than those of res judicata and estoppel (the latter having been abandoned before the Board).

Appeal (No. 13 of 1955) from an order of the Court of Appeal for Eastern Africa (October 22, 1954) whereby (i) an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Kenya (July 5, 1954) in favour of the present respondent for the recovery of possession of certain premises was dismissed, (ii) a finding of fact that the relationship between the parties was that of licensor and licensee (not landlord and tenant) was confirmed, and (iii) the action was remitted to the Supreme Court for the determination of certain limited issues only.

By the respondent's amended plaint, dated February 3, 1954, he alleged that he was tenant of a certain plot of land in Nairobi, and that the appellants were his statutory subtenants of part of the plot; and that the appellants had committed breaches of various covenants in their lease. He alleged, alternatively, that the appellants were licensees and that their licence had been revoked. Notice to quit had been served, but the appellants had not complied with it. The respondent claimed possession, or, alternatively, an injunction to restrain the appellants from committing further breaches of covenant, and damages.

The defendants pleaded, inter alia, that the action was res judicata because the matters in issue had been in issue in certain specified cases between the parties before the Central Rent Control Board.

HEPTULLA BROTHERS LTD. v. THAKORE.

and tenant or of licensor and licensee of the premises in question. The defendants, however, take the plea that this is not a live issue being already res judicata of another tribunal in proceedings to which some reference must first be made.

This appeal is a stage in a series of actions between the same parties. The matter started with proceedings before the Central Rent Control Board at Nairobi on an application dated January 27, 1951, by the plaintiff, described as "landlord," against the defendants, described as "tenant," for ejectment of the tenant for failure to pay rent and other charges and for "breaches of the "tenancy existing between the tenant and landlord." After defence had been entered the plaintiff restricted the grounds of his application to non-payment of rent and matters touching the payment of rent, and ultimately a consent order was made by the Rent Control Board on May 9, 1951, in the following terms: "The arrears due (Shs.5018/32 including rent for May, 1951) "and admitted must be paid by May 15, 1951. The rent of each "month must be paid in future in full, viz., Shs. 285/– inclusive "of water and dust bin only, in advance by the 5th day of that "month. Should there be any breach of the above conditions, "the landlord (head-tenant) will be entitled to vacant possession "forthwith. The parties agree to leave the question of costs to "the board and the board directs that each party bear its own "costs."

Some seven weeks later, on June 21, 1951, the defendants started proceedings before the Rent Control Board in respect of alleged interference by the plaintiff with the defendants' enjoyment of the shop premises occupied by them as his tenants. It appears from the "tenants' case" that there was some part excepted from the alleged let to the tenants which left that part in the occupation of the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff also occupied an upper floor to which access was had by a staircase situated near the front door of the shop. The defendants alleged that their use of, or access to, the shop was obstructed by a glass counter introduced by the plaintiff, who threatened further to erect an access to the staircase, and that this obstruction and threat had in view "to annoy and harass the tenants so as to "compel the tenants to vacate the premises." Their Lordships would observe that they find it impossible to appreciate from the "tenants' case" the nature and extent of the division of the premises between the parties and the manner of annoyance said to be caused or apprehended by the glass counter or by the threatened access. The plaintiff in his defence denied that he was the defendants' landlord, "having no privity of contract "with the claimants," and without prejudice to this denial admitted certain of the facts stated by the defendants, but in terms that do not make any clearer to their Lordships the nature of the division of the premises between the parties. He denied any right of the defendants to call for removal of the counter and that it or the proposed structural alteration would in any way harass and annoy the tenants and prayed that the "tenants' "case" be dismissed with costs.

No action appears to have been taken in these proceedings before April 20, 1953. On that date the plaintiff made application under section 16 (1) (b) of the Rent (Restriction) Ordinance, 1949, to the Rent Control Board for recovery of possession of the premises "on the grounds that the tenants have been guilty of "conduct which is a nuisance or annoyance to the claimant who "is a joint occupier" in a variety of respects specified in the application. The defendants entered a defence denying the plaintiff's allegations, and this and the previous application having been consolidated, the Rent Control Board gave judgment on November 26, 1953, in which they held that it was plain from the pleadings of the plaintiff that the relationship of landlord and tenant existed between the parties but that the plaintiff and the defendants were joint occupiers of the shop and not adjoining occupiers within the meaning of section 16 (1) (b) of the Ordinance. Accordingly, the Rent Control Board dismissed the application brought by the plaintiff under this section and gave leave to the defendants to withdraw their application against the plaintiff with liberty to bring a fresh case later upon the same facts.

The plaintiff then took further proceedings before the Rent Control Board against the defendants on December 7, 1953. In his plaint, he alleged that he was tenant of the plot in question and by lease dated May 1, 1941, sublet part of it to Mr. Ahamedali M. Heptulla for a period of two years and 11 months, by whom it was assigned to the defendants on May 9, 1942, and that on the expiry of the lease the defendants held over as statutory tenants upon the same terms and conditions as to rent and all other matters as were set forth in the lease. The plaint then set out certain covenants contained in the lease, which it is unnecessary for present purposes to specify, alleged breaches of the covenants in various respects, referred to the previous proceedings of April 20, 1953, and applied under section 16 (1) (a) of the Ordinance for an order for recovery of possession; an injunction; damages; costs; and such further and better relief as the court might consider just. This plaint was dismissed on December 14, 1953, on the ground that "the matter having "been absolutely disposed of by the board and the previous case "dismissed without permission to bring a fresh case, this fresh "plaint cannot be entertained by the board at all and must be "summarily rejected." Their Lordships' Board are not able fully to appreciate the grounds of this decision as the earlier application (of April 20, 1953) was brought under section 16 (1) (b) of the Ordinance, whereas the later was brought under section 16 (1) (a) of the Ordinance. But their Lordships do not find it necessary to enter into the merits of any of the proceedings brought before the Rent Control Board.

HEPTULLA BROTHERS LTD. v. THAKORE.

The plaintiff next started the present proceedings in the Supreme Court of Kenya at Nairobi on February 3, 1954. In his plaint he repeats verbatim the whole of the allegations made against the defendants in the earlier proceedings before the Rent Control Board commenced on December 7, 1953. The basis of his action has, however, been enlarged. He sues the defendants first as subtenants holding over as statutory tenants of part of the shop premises of which he alleges he is the tenant. Alternatively, he sues the defendants as his licensees of part of the premises. Further alternatively, he sues the defendants as occupiers of part of the aforesaid premises. He alleges that he has given the defendants notice to quit and he prays for (i) an order for recovery of possession or, in the alternative, (ii) an injunction restraining them from committing either further breaches of the aforesaid covenants of their tenancy, or further breaches of the terms and conditions of their licence, or further acts of nuisance; and, in any event, for damages, costs and further and other relief.

In defence the defendants plead res judicata and estoppel in respect of the proceedings before the Rent Control Board, claim to be contractual tenants of the plaintiff, deny that they are his licensees and otherwise traverse the allegations of the plaintiff in various detailed respects to which their Lordships do not find it necessary to refer.

The action came before Corrie J., who, relying largely on a judgment of the Court of Appeal for Eastern Africa in Karamat Ali v. Champion Shoe Co.,[1] held that there was not a letting such as would bring the parties within the scope of the Increase of Rent (Restriction) Ordinance, 1949, and that, accordingly, the Rent Control Board had no jurisdiction to deal with the matters at issue between the parties. There was thus no res judicata or estoppel. He further held that the relationship between the parties was that of licensor and licensee, and that the term of the licence having expired, it was competent for the plaintiff to give the defendants notice to quit, and that this had been done. He therefore made an order for recovery of possession.

From this judgment the defendants appealed to the Court of Appeal for Eastern Africa. Their grounds of appeal were that as the case had been argued by agreement between counsel only on two preliminary points, viz., the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court (now abandoned) and res judicata, the case, in the event of these objections being overruled, should have proceeded to a hearing on the merits; further, that the judge had erred in overruling the defendants' plea of res judicata and estoppel; in holding that the relationship between the parties was that of licensor and licensee; and in making an order for recovery of possession. On October 22, 1954, the Court of Appeal, without delivering any judgment, made the following order:—

" 1. That this appeal be dismissed.

" 2. That the order for possession made by the Supreme Court " and the finding of fact that the licence had been revoked be " set aside, but that the finding that the relationship between " the parties was that of licensor and licensee be confirmed.

" 3. That the action be remitted to the Supreme Court for the " determination of the following issues only:—(i) Whether the " licence granted by the respondent to the appellants was revoked " in fact. (ii) Whether the appellants committed the alleged " breaches of covenants or terms of the licence, or, alternatively, " the alleged nuisance, (iii) (a) whether the said licence was " lawfully determined, and (b) whether the respondent is entitled " to the relief claimed in the plaint, or any part of it, and the " amount of damages, if any.

" AND with a direction that judgment be entered accordingly.

" AND IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the appellants do pay " three-quarters of the costs of this appeal and that the costs of " the previous proceedings in the Supreme Court be paid as " ordered by that court and that the costs of the re-trial be " reserved to the discretion of the trial judge."

From this order an appeal has been taken to their Lordships' Board. The submissions for the defendants before the Board were that the issues between the parties, having already been determined by the Rent Control Board from whose decisions no appeal had been taken, were res judicata and could not be re-opened before the Supreme Court, and that the plaintiff was also barred by estoppel in pais from reopening these issues. If wrong on these points the case, it was submitted, should be sent back for trial on all issues other than res judicata and estoppel. Before the Board defendant's counsel ultimately abandoned his plea of estoppel. These submissions were traversed by counsel for the plaintiff.

It is agreed between the parties and seems also to their Lordships clear that the Rent Control Board has jurisdiction only on issues arising between landlord and tenant. The relevant Ordinance is the Increase of Rent (Restriction) Ordinance, 1949, as amended by the Increase of Rent (Restriction) (Amendment No. 2) Ordinance, 1951. The Ordinance applies to all premises, whether dwelling-houses or business premises, situate in the area of a Rent Control Board, with certain exceptions which are not material to the present case. (Section 1 (2) of the Ordinance of 1949.) By the Ordinance of 1951 " business premises " is defined as meaning " a building or part of a building let or to be let for " the public service or for business trade or professional purposes, " and includes the land occupied therewith and comprised in the " letting "; and " dwelling-house " means " any house or part " of a house or room let as a dwelling or place of residence and " includes the site of the house and the garden and other lands " or buildings comprised in and incidental to the letting, but not " let as a separate entity or source of profit." The Ordinance accordingly only applies to let premises. It was submitted, however, for the defendants that the Rent Control Board had committed to it by the Ordinance, either expressly or impliedly, the power to determine conclusively (subject to any right of appeal) the question of its own jurisdiction. This submission was based on the terms of section 5 (1) (n) of the Ordinance of 1949, which runs as follows: "[The board] shall have power to do all things "which it is required or empowered to do by or under the pro- "visions of the Ordinance, and in particular shall have power— "(n) to exercise jurisdiction in all civil matters and questions "arising under this Ordinance." In their Lordships' view, this provision does not have the meaning or effect for which the defendants contend. It does no more than confirm the competence of the board to deal with all civil matters and questions arising under the Ordinance. It does not give to the board the power to determine what civil matters and questions arise under the Ordinance. The board have in any particular case to be satisfied that a relationship of landlord and tenant does exist as a preliminary to bringing the Ordinance into operation, but that is a function merely incidental to the application of any section of the Ordinance that is invoked and not a power conferred by any section of the Ordinance.

On this view it is unnecessary to deal with various aspects of the plea of res judicata which were canvassed before their Lordships' Board. The matter is really ruled by the following passage in the judgment of Lord Esher M.R. in Regina v. Commissioners for Special Purposes of the Income Tax[2]: "When an inferior court or tribunal or body, which has to "exercise the power of deciding facts, is first established by "Act of Parliament, the legislature has to consider what powers "it will give that tribunal or body. It may in effect say that, "if a certain state of facts exists and is shewn to such tribunal "or body before it proceeds to do certain things, it shall have "jurisdiction to do such things, but not otherwise. There it is "not for them conclusively to decide whether that state of "facts exists, and, if they exercise the jurisdiction without its "existence, what they do may be questioned, and it will be held "that they have acted without jurisdiction. But there is "another state of things which may exist. The legislature may "intrust the tribunal or body with a jurisdiction, which includes "the jurisdiction to determine whether the preliminary state of "facts exists as well as the jurisdiction, on finding that it does "exist, to proceed further or do something more. When the "legislature are establishing such a tribunal or body with limited "jurisdiction, they also have to consider, whatever jurisdiction "they give them, whether there shall be any appeal from their "decision, for otherwise there will be none. In the second of "the two cases I have mentioned it is an erroneous application

" of the formula to say that the tribunal cannot give themselves " jurisdiction by wrongly deciding certain facts to exist, because " the legislature gave them jurisdiction to determine all the facts, " including the existence of the preliminary facts on which the " further exercise of their jurisdiction depends; and if they were " given jurisdiction so to decide, without any appeal being given, " there is no appeal from such exercise of their jurisdiction."

In their Lordships' opinion the present case falls within the first of the two types of cases mentioned by Lord Esher. The question of the relationship of landlord and tenant cannot, therefore, be made res judicata by a finding of the Rent Control Board if a superior court decides that the facts to constitute that relationship do not exist. The finding of the Rent Control Board in these circumstances can never be anything more than a collateral finding which cannot raise a plea of res judicata.

There remains only the question whether the order of the Court of Appeal should stand. That order confirms the finding of the Supreme Court that the relationship between the parties was that of licensor and licensee. Their Lordships have been unable to discover from the material before them any evidence on which this question can be satisfactorily determined, and they have been referred to nothing other than the pleadings and the admissions and actings of the parties therein, as disclosed in the record of the various proceedings to which reference has already been made. In their Lordships' opinion, these are quite insufficient to establish whether the relationship was one of landlord and tenant, or of licensor and licensee. No evidence other than the pleadings before the Rent Control Board and the orders made therein was before the Supreme Court. Their Lordships have reached the conclusion that the finding of the Court of Appeal on the relationship of the parties cannot, in the circumstances, be supported without evidence of the relevant facts, including the titles, if any, to possession and the nature of the occupation of the premises.

The appellants were unable to obtain from the Court of Appeal a stay of proceedings pending the present appeal to their Lordships' Board, and their Lordships have been informed that further procedure under the order of the Court of Appeal has taken place, including the granting of an order for possession of the premises in question. These are not, however, matters which can affect the judgment of their Lordships' Board.

The Board will humbly advise Her Majesty that the orders of the Supreme Court and of the Court of Appeal for Eastern Africa be set aside; and that the case be remitted to the Supreme Court to be tried on all the issues between the parties other than the issues of res judicata and estoppel. Their Lordships direct that the appellants (defendants) bear the costs of the hearing before the Supreme Court on the preliminary points of res judicata and estoppel and that otherwise each party bear their own costs in the hearing before the Court of Appeal and before their Lordships' Board.

* PILCHER v. PILCHER (No. 2).

Husband and Wife — Maintenance — Justices — Arrears accrued when order apparently discharged — Further arrears — Enforcement — Arrears—Retrospective time-limit—Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952 (15 & 16 Geo. 6 & 1 Eliz. 2, c. 55), s. 76.

A wife obtained a maintenance order for £3 a week in all for herself and the child of the marriage in the magistrates' court, Gibraltar, in May, 1952, which was registered in England in July, 1953, under the provisions of section 1 (1) of the Maintenance Orders (Facilities for Enforcement) Act, 1920, after the husband had come to England. In November, 1953, the order was discharged by an English court of summary jurisdiction, the husband alleging that the wife was in desertion; but in May, 1955, an appeal out of time by the wife against the discharge was allowed ([1955] P. 318; [1955] 3 W.L.R. 232; [1955] 2 All E.R. 644).

In June, 1955, the wife applied to the English court for the enforcement of arrears, which by then amounted to some £396. No payments at all had been made since December, 1954. The magistrate found that the husband's reasons for non-payment were the activating reason that he was determined that he would not pay the wife and that he wished to argue (although precluded from doing so) that his wife was in desertion. While appreciating that the court had power, under section 76 of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, to remit all or part of any arrears in its discretion, he felt that to do so in the present case would pro tanto be revoking the original order by a "back-stairs" method:—

Held, (1) that the magistrate had wrongly exercised his discretion, for it was clear from section 76 of the Act that by remitting arrears the order is not revoked.

(2) That the fact that for a period when arrears were actually accruing the order had apparently been revoked was a relevant matter for consideration in deciding whether any arrears should be remitted.

(3) That it was desirable when enforcing maintenance orders in courts of summary jurisdiction that there should be a retrospective time-limit, such as in the Divorce Division, where the period was one year.

(4) That the proper order would be to remit all arrears which had accrued prior to the date of the application except for £100.

Appeal from the West London magistrates' court.

On March 17, 1952, while the husband was resident in Gibraltar and the wife in La Linea, Spain, the magistrates' court at Gibraltar adjudged that the husband had been guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for his wife and child, and ordered him to pay her through the clerk of the court £2 a week for herself and £1 a week for the child.

The husband returned to England not long after the order was made; the wife and child continued to reside in La Linea. On July 13, 1953, the order was registered at the West London magistrates' court under the provisions of section 1 (1) of the Maintenance Orders Act, 1920. On July 20, 1953, the husband applied for the discharge of the order, alleging that the wife had refused a bona fide offer of reconciliation; and the order was discharged on November 3, 1953. On an application in February, 1954, to enforce arrears an order was made in respect of arrears accrued due prior to November 3, 1953; a further application to enforce arrears in November, 1954, was dismissed. On May 24, 1955, the wife, after being given leave to appeal out of time, successfully appealed to the Divisional Court against the order of November, 1953, discharging the original order, and against the orders of February and November, 1954, in respect of arrears.[1]

On June 21, 1955, the husband was summoned at the West London court in respect of arrears which had by then accrued, namely, £396 17s. 10d. He had made no payments of any kind since December, 1954, and stated in his evidence that he earned £9 a week and that he still maintained his attitude that he would not pay his wife anything. An order for the full amount was made against him, and the magistrate, Mr. Guest, gave the following judgment:—

"The position today is that the order made in Gibraltar "stands because no court in this country has jurisdiction to vary "or revoke it. Therefore, it is now the duty of this court on "the application of the wife, to consider to what extent and why "the respondent is in arrears and what order should be made. "I find that today the arrears are £396 17s. 10d. on an order "of £2 for wife and £1 for child weekly, and that the respon-"dent has made no payment since December, 1954. His means "have been carefully inquired into and, in my opinion, are and "were sufficient to enable him to pay the weekly order with no "more difficulty than lies on many other respondents to similar "orders. His reasons for non-payment seem to me to be two— "the activating reason that he has determined he will not pay "this woman, the secondary that he wishes to argue, as is his "moral right and ought to be a legal possibility but is not, that "his wife has deserted him. On the second reason his counsel "has drawn my attention to the remarks of the Divisional Court. ". . . I am aware that the power to remit all or part of any "arrears lies in the discretion of the court but that discretion "must be judicially exercised, and I cannot think that it would "be a proper exercise of discretion to remit arrears in a case

" where one feels that the order itself might require to be varied " or revoked but has not the jurisdiction to consider whether so " to do. I understand the great hardship of a man being subject " to an order which he can never apply in Great Britain to have " varied or revoked, but as Parliament has given no power in " orders such as these I would be wrong to take it by the back- " stairs; the same reasoning applied to the power counsel suggests " I have to refuse to enforce the order. I ought to say that as " the wife is out of not only this jurisdiction but of the jurisdic- " tion of the court which made the order—I would if I felt I had " the power remit all the arrears applicable to her but none " applicable to the child. Finally, in view of the respondent's " statement that he will not pay and my finding that he could " and always could have paid, I do not see any way of avoiding " committal, but as his counsel has suggested that he might like " to appeal against this decision, and as undoubtedly this is one " of the most tangled cases ever to come before this court, I shall " in fact adjourn these proceedings until Tuesday, August 9, " 1955, to see whether notices of motion have been served. I " therefore formally, to enable an appeal, make the committal " order now which it seems I cannot avoid."

An order was made for the payment of £396 17s. 10d. or committal for three months suspended in the first instance for six weeks.

The husband appealed.

J. Scott Henderson Q.C. and Eric Stockdale for the husband.
Melford Stevenson Q.C. and Joseph Jackson for the wife.

No cases were cited in argument.

Lord Merriman P. This is a husband's appeal against an order made by Mr. Guest, the metropolitan magistrate, sitting at the West London court, for enforcement by committal of the sum of £396 17s. 10d. said to be the arrears of maintenance in favour of the wife, and of the child of the marriage in respect of whom she was awarded custody, due under an order. The full history—to avoid repetition—is set out in the reported case of Pilcher v. Pilcher.[1] I say " to avoid repetition " because an extremely confused history was, I hope, to some extent elucidated by the combined efforts of my brother and myself on that occasion; but the upshot of it was that the original order, made by the Gibraltar court, was held to have been revoked without jurisdiction to do so for more than one reason by one of the courts in London—I expressly avoid using the contentious word " Metropolitan " court in that context—and that two attempts to enforce that order before the West London court were still alive. Both were remitted to the West London court on the wife's original complaint to enforce the order, and our judgment concluded with these words: "The two complaints by or on "behalf of the wife for the enforcement of arrears will be remitted "to the West London magistrates' court for rehearing. We wish, "however, to make it plain that we do not seek to give any "indication of the course that should be taken on the rehearing "of those complaints."

I pause to say in passing that we had referred in express terms to the power given by section 76 of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, in connexion with these complaints, to remit the whole or any part of the arrears. Our judgment ended: "It will be a "matter entirely for the magistrate's discretion in the light of "the evidence before him whether to enforce or to remit as he "thinks proper the whole or any part of the sum due under the "registered order."

If those words mean anything they mean that the magistrate could either enforce the whole or enforce part, or remit the whole or remit part, and that is what we intended should happen. But on an application to enforce the whole Mr. Guest, in effect, held that he had no option but to enforce the whole, and he has done so, and has done so for a reason which neither counsel has attempted to justify, that if he were to remit, either in whole or in part, as I understand it, he would pro tanto be revoking the original order by a "back-stairs" method.

Well, I do not think it is necessary to say more than that the fallacy of that argument is apparent, because it is perfectly certain and clear, on the face of the section, that by remitting arrears one does not revoke an order. The two things are entirely distinct.

Now, the question in the circumstances is, what should we do? This litigation has already been considerably protracted, and I gather that it is now in process of being further protracted by a divorce suit at the instance of the husband, who is asking for the dissolution of his marriage on the ground of alleged desertion by the wife. I merely say that, if and when that suit terminates in his favour, it may be a very potent matter to be brought before any court which has to deal with any further stages of this Gibraltar order for maintenance on the ground of wilful neglect to maintain.

At the moment we have to deal with the fact that having remitted the order for enforcement or remittance of arrears, nothing, in fact, has happened; and we have the right—indeed, the duty—to deal with the matter either by remitting it further to the magistrate or by making any order which we think that the magistrate ought to have made. There is one fact which is common ground, and that is that during a period of time, which amounted to about 18 months in all, the order, albeit wrongly, had been in form revoked, and it is clear on any view of the matter that this large figure of arrears includes, amongst other things, the arrears at £3 a week which would have accrued due; indeed, which have accrued due during that time when once it is held that the revocation was of no validity.

PILCHER v. PILCHER (No. 2).

Nevertheless, it seems to me to be a matter clearly for consideration in deciding what should be done about a figure of £396 in respect of which, without any question of payment by instalments, the man has been committed to prison for non-payment, that it does contain a large sum of money which has accrued during a period when he supposed he was under no liability to pay at all.

There is another consideration which I think should apply, and that is that, not, I think, as a matter of law but as a matter of practice, it is usually considered by courts which are asked to enforce orders of this sort, and it certainly is the practice in this Division when men are brought up before its courts for committal in respect of maintenance orders, that there should be a time-limit retrospectively. The custom in this Division is not to enforce arrears for more than a year backwards.

Either of these two considerations in this case seems to me to be an illustration of another overriding principle which, I think, should always be borne in mind in considering these questions of enforcing arrears, and, indeed, in connexion with the amounts of the orders themselves, and that is that it is always better to have an order in force for a sum which a man will pay rather than go to prison, instead of having one in force for which he will go to prison rather than pay. It is clear that this order as it stands, for £396 17s. 10d., has been shown quite plainly to be one in respect of which he would go to prison rather than pay. I can well understand that that may be so, but, of course, he has defied the court—there is no question about that—in saying very foolishly that nothing would induce him to pay anything. That has been minimized to some extent by Mr. Scott Henderson, who, while making it plain that he has no authority to put forward any proposition at all, has suggested to us that, in effect, it would be reasonable to enforce only those arrears which have accrued in respect of the maintenance for the child, as distinct from the maintenance for the wife.

I am not prepared to deal with it on that basis. The whole order is an order in favour of the wife, as has been explained on more than one occasion by this court. What I think we should do is to try to find some sum which, in the circumstances of this case, would enable the order to go forward, from this date, at any rate, with some inducement to the man to keep up his responsibility to his wife until in some way or another, with which it is not at the moment in our power to deal, some different order is substituted for that which is at present in force, or the present order is cancelled altogether.

I think that the proper thing to do is to remit all the arrears which had accrued before June 21, 1955, when the matter was before the magistrate, except £100 of such arrears, that the committal order should stand, but be suspended on the condition that the husband pays 5s. a week off the arrears in addition to the amount of the order.

Lord Evershed M.R., Birkett and Parker L.JJ.

Building — Contract — Implied term — Contract to complete erection of dwelling-house — Erection in accordance with specifications — Whether implied warranty as to fitness for habitation.
Contract—Implied term.

The plaintiff agreed to purchase from the defendant, a builder, a plot of land with a partially erected dwelling-house on it and the defendant undertook to complete the dwelling-house in accordance with the plan and specifications annexed to the agreement. The specification provided that the walls were to be nine-inch brick walls. The dwelling-house having been erected, the sale was completed and the plaintiff took possession. It subsequently appeared that the nine-inch wall on the south side of the house did not keep driving rain out and one of the bedrooms was as a result unusable. The plaintiff claimed damages. The county court judge held that the defendant had carried out the building work precisely in accordance with the specification and with sound materials and good workmanship. He, however, gave judgment for the plaintiff, holding that the plaintiff had relied on the defendant's skill and that there was an implied warranty that the house should be fit for human habitation:—

Held, that on the sale of land with an agreement to erect on it, or to complete the erection of, a dwelling-house, prima facie, there was an implied condition that the house when built should be fit for human habitation; the express terms of the contract might be such, however, as to be wholly or partly inconsistent with any such implied condition and, if wholly inconsistent, they would negative any reliance which otherwise it would be said the buyer placed on the skill and judgment of the seller; if, on the other hand, the express terms were only partly inconsistent, there would be room for the implied term to operate in the area not covered by the express condition. Applying that principle to the facts, the defendant, having carried out the building works precisely in accordance with the specifications with good materials and workmanship, and it having been established that the house could only have been made fit for habitation if additional work had been done which would be inconsistent with the terms of the contract, there was no room for the operation of any implied warranty that the house should be fit for habitation; and that, accordingly, the plaintiff's claim failed.

Dictum of Romer L.J. in Perry v. Sharon Development Co. Ltd. [1937] 4 All E.R. 390, 394 applied.

Appeal from Judge Glazebrook sitting at Bromley County Court.

By a contract dated May 28, 1953, the plaintiff, George Daniel Lynch, agreed to purchase from the defendant, Stanley Arthur Thorne, a plot of land known at No. 183 Meadway, Bromley, Kent, with a dwelling-house in course of erection and the defendant agreed to complete the dwelling-house in accordance with the specification annexed to the contract. The specification, which was detailed, provided that the walls should be nine-inch brick walls. The house was completed and the premises were conveyed to the plaintiff on September 30, 1953, and he took possession on October 8, 1953.

The house was in an exposed position and the nine-inch outside south wall of one of the bedrooms failed to prevent the damp penetrating, with the result that the bedroom became unusable. Some of the windows were of faulty construction and let in the rain. According to the evidence of expert witnesses a nine-inch wall would probably not be effective to keep out the rain where a house was in such an exposed situation as was this house. The plaintiff in this action claimed damages alleging that it was an implied term of the contract for sale that the dwelling-house when completed should be reasonably fit for human habitation.

The county court judge held that the defendant had completed the house precisely in accordance with the specification annexed to the contract and of sound material and good workmanship. He further held that it was an implied term of the contract that the house should be reasonably fit for human habitation. He gave judgment for the plaintiff for the sum of £95, of which £80 was the cost of making the wall damp-proof and £15 the cost of treating the windows.

The defendant appealed against so much of the judgment as related to the wall. He did not appeal against the decision in respect of the windows, since the specification did not cover the defect of which the plaintiff complained.

The terms of the contract and of the specification, the evidence of the expert witnesses, and the county court judge's judgment are more fully stated in the judgment of Lord Evershed M.R.

The following cases, in addition to those referred to in the judgment, were cited in argument: Miller v. Cannon Hill Estates

*Ltd.; Hoskins v. Woodham †; Jennings v. Tavener ‡; Reigate v. Union Manufacturing Co. (Ramsbottom) Ltd. and Elton Copdyeing Co. Ltd. §

LORD EVERSHED M.R. The question in this case is whether the defendant, who was the builder of the house now belonging to the plaintiff, is liable upon an implied covenant for the loss or damage suffered by the plaintiff because one of the rooms on the first floor, as it turns out, is not weather-proof; it has indeed admitted damp to such an extent that the plaintiff has been unable to use it as his son's bedroom. Therefore, the plaintiff may say (and for the purposes of this judgment I will say) that quoad that room the house has turned out to be uninhabitable or not fit for human habitation.

The law of England has been for many generations well settled that prima facie upon a contract for sale of a piece of land with a house on it, and similarly upon a contract for the demise of land with a house on it, there is no warranty as to the habitability of the house. The law so settled is illustrated in the well known case of Hart v. Windsor,[1] and the judgment in that case of Parke B. The rule is, or has sometimes been said to be, a hard one for the purchaser or lessee who has to console himself with the Latin maxim caveat emptor. But to the general rule there are undoubtedly exceptions: for example, when the subject-matter of a contract of letting is a furnished flat or house, then there is implied a covenant or warranty that the subject-matter is fit for habitation: see the judgment also of Parke B. in Smith v. Marrable.[2] Another exception arises where the contract is not merely a contract for the sale of a piece of land with a house on it, but is a contract for the sale of a piece of land with a house, plus a covenant or obligation on the part of the vendor to build or complete the house. The last mentioned exception has been illustrated in several cases to which we have been referred, and it will suffice if I refer to one of them, namely, Perry v. Sharon Development Co. Ltd.[3] In the course of his judgment in that case MacKinnon L.J. put the matter thus: "There is obviously "a difference in kind between a contract for the sale of a house "which is an existing and complete structure and a contract for "the sale of an uncompleted house which has to be completed "by the vendor. In the former case, quite clearly there is no "implied undertaking by the vendor as to the fitness of the "house or its condition. In such circumstances, the maxim "caveat emptor clearly applies to the full when the purchaser "inspects the house by himself, or by his surveyor, and makes "up his mind as to its condition and fitness for occupation. The "other type of house, a house only partly erected, or to be "completed, is different in two respects. In the first place, the "maxim caveat emptor cannot apply, and the buyer, insofar as "the house is not yet completed, cannot inspect it, either by "himself or by his surveyor, and, in the second place, from the "point of view of the vendor, the contract is not merely a "contract to sell, but also a contract to do building work, and, "insofar as it is a contract to do building work, it is only natural "and proper that there should be an implied undertaking that "the building work should be done properly."

Where there is a written contract expressly setting forth the bargain between the parties it is, as a general rule, also well established that you only imply terms under the necessity of some compulsion. It was thus that Lord Russell of Killowen expressed himself in Luxor (Eastbourne) Ltd. v. Cooper,[4] and similarly Scrutton L.J. in the case to which Mr. Garland referred us of Reigate v. Union Manufacturing Co. (Ramsbottom) Ltd.[5] I am, however, prepared to assume for the purposes of this judgment that, whether or not it can be said that any necessity so compels in the case where a vendor contracts to sell the land and also to complete the building, in such a case prima facie there is an implied covenant on the vendor builder's part that he will complete the house so as to make it habitable. Still, such a term prima facie to be implied must, according to well established principle, always yield to the express letter of the bargain. I need do no more than refer to the judgment of Romer L.J. in Perry's case.[6] He said[7]: "It is well-established "by numerous authorities, to some of which Serjeant Sullivan "has called our attention, that, in the case of the sale of a "completed house, there is to be implied on the part of the "vendor no warranty as to the house being in any particular "condition. The same rule would apply in the case of an "uncompleted house, which is the subject-matter of a sale, "where the structure stands at the time of the sale. Where, "however, the contract is for the sale of a house when completed, "there is an implied contract on the part of the vendor, in the "absence of there being any express contract as to the way in "which the house is to be completed, that the house shall be "completed in such a way that it is fit for human habitation."

The contract that was entered into provides in the first clause that the vendor, the defendant, should sell the plot of land specified, together with the house intended then to be erected upon it. There follow certain clauses, common in contracts for the sale of land. Clause 4 provides: "The vendor will complete the building "in course of erection on the said plot of land in accordance with "the block plan and specification attached to this Agreement." It was conceded before the county court judge, or at least clearly found by him, that by the term "block plan" was meant a

1/8th-inch scale plan. I therefore look to see what is the meaning and extent of the express obligation which clause 4 in the contract states. The specification provides for the manner in which the work is to be done, that is to say, it specifies inter alia the material to be used. Among other of the clauses it provides as follows: "Brickwork to be laid in cement mortar, facing bricks "to be Ockley double diamond dark multi red facings pointed "in cement to special colour. Damp proof course to be as "approved, with a cement rendered plinth," and so forth. I place that specification side by side with the 1/8th-inch scale plan, which discloses quite plainly—and upon this the judge's finding is precise—that the southern wall, with which we are here concerned, was to be, and was shown and specified as intended to be, a solid 9-inch brick wall, the brickwork to be of the character mentioned in the specification.

The findings of fact in light of that bargain—and nobody has sought to quarrel with them, or so far as I can see could quarrel with them—are these: the judge has said, after referring to the plan and to the specification: "It is not disputed that "the house has been built exactly in accordance with the draw- "ings and specification." What has turned out to be the result I think I can most expeditiously state by reading a paragraph of the judgment: "Three architects, all of whom have inspected "the house, have given evidence about the cause of this pene- "tration. The south and west walls are rather exposed for a "London house, and Mr. Woodward"—he was the plaintiff's architect—"said that in that situation a 9-inch solid brick wall "(which is what these walls are) will not prevent penetration; "they should be cavity walls, or solid walls tile-hung. Mr. "Tachell"—he was one of the architects on the other side— "said that in such a situation a 9-inch wall is bound to admit a "certain amount of damp. He said that in due course, perhaps "two or three years, the bricks may 'weather' and, if they "do, that will reduce the penetration. Mr. Woodward agreed "with this, but neither of them could say that weathering was "likely to stop penetration altogether. The third architect,"— on the same side as Mr. Tachell—"Mr. Pipe, thought that the "rain probably came through minute cracks in the cement mortar "rather than through the bricks themselves (which are a hard "type) and he gave some interesting reasons for preferring the "old type lime mortar," which was not specified. "All three "gentlemen agreed that the bricks and mortar are of good quality "and the bricklayers' workmanship excellent. I think it would "be fair to summarise their evidence by saying that one of them "would expect a 9-inch solid wall in that position to allow driving "rain to penetrate and the other two would not be at all surprised "if it did."

The effect of that evidence and those findings is that the contract having provided that the house should be built and completed in a particular way by the use of particular materials of particular characteristics, the builder precisely and exactly complied with his obligation. And he is also found to have shown through his servants a high standard of workmanship. Prima facie that finding seems to me, on the language of Romer L.J., necessarily to exclude the operation of any implied contract. May I repeat the language of the Lord Justice [8]: "Where, "however, the contract is for the sale of a house when com- "pleted, there is an implied contract on the part of the vendor, "in the absence of there being any express contract as to the "way in which the house is to be completed, that the house "shall be completed in such a way that it is fit for human "habitation." Here there was an express contract as to the way in which the house was to be completed. The express provisions were exactly complied with, and any variation from them which would have rendered this wall water proof would (as Parker L.J. observed during the course of the argument) have been a deviation from the express language of the contract.

Mr. Garland has sought to avoid that result in one of two ways. He has said, first, as I have followed him: even though there is here an express contract precisely prescribing the way in which this work is to be done, still there is an overriding promise or warranty that the edifice, when built in strict accordance with those terms, will be a habitable house. That seems to me to involve an extension of the principle of implied terms for which I can find no authority, and which indeed seems to me to be in direct conflict with the authorities to which I have already referred. Then, secondly, he says—and Mr. Garland uses this rather to emphasize and support the main contention already stated: after all, the plaintiff, the unfortunate Mr. Lynch, no expert himself in the mysteries of architecture and house building, relied, and the judge found that he relied, upon the skill and the judgment of the defendant, the builder. I am unable to derive from that fact the conclusion which commended itself to the judge. Of course, if a skilled person promises to do a job, that is, to produce a particular thing, whether a house or a motor-car or a piece of machinery, and he makes no provision as a matter of bargain as to the precise structure or article he will create, then it may well be that the buyer of the structure or article relies upon the judgment and skill of the other party to produce that which he says he will produce. But that, after all, is only another way of formulating the existence in such circumstances of an implied warranty. On the other hand, if two parties elect to make a bargain which specifies in precise detail what one of them will do, then, in the absence of some other express provision, it would appear to me to follow that the bargain is that which they have made; and so long as the party doing the work does that which he has contracted to do, that is the extent of his obligation. For the plaintiff obviously one cannot help feeling a great deal of sympathy; but a grown adult man is presumably capable of taking competent skilled advice if he wants to; and if he elects not to do so but to make a bargain in precise terms with someone else, then, though no doubt he does rely upon the skill of the other party in a sense, he only does so in the sense that he assumes that the other party, as was the fact in this case, will do the job he has promised to do competently and, at best, that he believes that the house he is going to build will be a habitable house. But that is far short of importing into the transaction any such overriding condition or warranty as that for which Mr. Garland has contended. It would appear almost to involve the result that because the plaintiff elected not to take advice himself, therefore there was some duty of care thrust upon the defendant which should more properly have been borne by somebody engaged by the plaintiff. These considerations seems to me to find no place in the authorities, as I have understood them, and since, as I think, there was here what Romer L.J. has called an express contract as to the way in which the house was to be completed, I can find no room for an implied warranty, the only effect of the operation of which would, so far as I can see, be to create an inconsistency with the express language of the bargain made.

Sympathising, therefore, as I do with the plaintiff (but let me say also with the defendant, who appears to be a perfectly conscientious builder who performed his task with the utmost skill) this is a case in which I think, with all respect to the judge, the plaintiff cannot recover damages from the defendant. I think that the judge should have dismissed the action, so far as this part of the case is concerned. I do not forget that there was another claim relating to a window, and it is not now in dispute that the terms of the specification, plus the plan, did not so precisely identify the nature of the work to be done as to exclude the operation of an implied obligation to do the job in regard to the window effectively. Upon that matter we are not asked to express an opinion. So far as this claim is concerned, I think the judge should have dismissed it, and that this appeal accordingly ought to be allowed.

BIRKETT L.J. I am entirely of the same opinion. We have this remarkable case that a contract, which expressly stated the manner in which the house was to be completed, was fulfilled to the very letter, the workmanship and the materials being of the very best. Neverthless, there is no doubt about the findings that this particular nine-inch wall did allow driving rain to penetrate.

Therefore, the only question is the legal question. Mr. Garland presented what appeared to be an attractive argument that, underlying all the terms of the written contract there was an implied warranty that when all the written terms were carried out, the completed house would be fit for human habitation. He said that the plaintiff who obviously knew nothing about technical matters, relied upon the skill and judgment of the defendant, who manifestly did. That was the argument which the county court judge accepted. He said: "If the "builder says, 'I will build you a house according to this plan "'which I have made' there is, I think, an implied term that "the plan will result in a habitable house, provided the "customer relied on the builder's skill in drawing the plan. "Applying the same reasoning to a contract for the sale of a "house to be erected or completed according to an agreed plan, "the issue seems to me to depend first, upon whether the plan "was the builder's own or was merely the instructions he "received from the purchaser; and if the former, whether the "purchaser relied upon it or exercised his own judgment." Then he concluded: "The gist of the matter is the buyer's reliance on "the seller's skill. If, though the seller provide the plan and "specification of a house to be built, it appears that the buyer "did not rely on his skill (for instance, that he consulted his "own architect) no term or warranty is implied. I am satisfied "that in the present case the plaintiff regarded the defendant as "an expert and relied entirely on his plan and specification; and "therefore I hold there was an implied warranty that the house "would be reasonably fit for habitation."

v.

Birkett L.J

The argument on the contrary was put by Mr. Duveen in the court below and by Mr. Davies here: here there was a contract in express terms; those express terms have been fulfilled to the letter; there is certainly no room for the application of any implied warranty. It cannot be said that the workmanship was bad or the materials bad because all that is concluded by the finding of the county court judge. It is submitted on behalf of the defendant that, when you have a contract of this nature, express in its terms, there is no room for the application of the implied warranty suggested by Mr. Garland and found by the county court judge. In Perry v. Sharon Development Co. Ltd.[9] Romer L.J. said: "Where, however, the contract is for "the sale of a house when completed, there is an implied con-"tract on the part of the vendor, in the absence of there being "any express contract as to the way in which the house is to "be completed, that the house shall be completed in such a "way that it is fit for human habitation." Here there was an express contract as to the very way in which this completion should be carried out. That is agreed and the judge has found that the house was completed in precisely that way. I think, therefore, there was no room for the application of this implied term and that the county court judge in applying it was wrong. For these reasons I agree with the judgment of the Master of the Rolls, and I think this appeal ought to be allowed.

PARKER L.J. I have come to the same conclusion and can state my reasons very shortly. This contract was at any rate partly a contract for work and labour. The plaintiff clearly desired the house for habitation and to some extent relied on the skill and judgment of the defendant, who was a builder of houses. Those facts must be taken to be known by the defendant. In those circumstances I think that, prima facie, there is an implied condition that the house when built shall be fit for human habitation. I say prima facie because, of course, the express terms of the contract may be such as to show that they are wholly or partly inconsistent with any such implied condition. If wholly inconsistent that will clearly negative any reliance which otherwise it would be said the buyer placed on the skill and judgment of the seller. If, on the other hand, the express terms are only partly inconsistent, there will be room for the implied condition to operate in the area not covered by the express condition.

Applying that to the facts of this case, there was, as it seems to me, by reference to the specification and the plan, an express condition that the wall should be nine-inch solid walls made of a particular kind of facing brick and laid in and pointed with cement. The county court judge has found that that work was precisely carried out by the builder and carried out with good workmanship. Despite that, the south bedroom was clearly not fit for habitation by reason of driving rain seeping through the brickwork. How could this have been avoided? Only, as it seems to me, by doing something such as making cavity walls, rendering the brickwork, hanging tiles on the brickwork—all of which, quite plainly, are inconsistent with the express terms of the contract deducible from the specification and the plan.

Accordingly, so far as concerns the failure in this case to make the house fit for habitation, there was no room for the operation of any such term. Accordingly Mr. Garland is driven to putting the case in this way, that throughout there is an overriding condition, warranty, or guarantee (whatever you like to call it) that the house will be fit for habitation. In other words he is forced to imply a term which in effect overrides the express terms of the contract. It seems to me that that is a very bold proposition, because by its very nature an implied term can only operate in so far as it is permitted by the express terms of the contract so to do. For these reasons and the reasons given by my Lords, I would allow this appeal.

Appeal allowed.

* WISEBURGH v. DOMVILLE (INSPECTOR OF TAXES).

Revenue—Income tax—Profits of trade—Damages—Proceedings by agent for breach of contract terminating agency agreement—Compromise of proceedings on payment of agreed damages—Compensation received by agent for loss of agency—Taxable as profits of trade.
Conflict of Laws—Scottish and English law—Income tax.

A manufacturers' agent entered into an agreement with a company to act as their agent for a certain period. The company dismissed him without giving him due notice and he brought an action against them, claiming damages for breach of contract, an account of the commission due, and payment thereof. The action was settled on terms agreed between the parties which were embodied in an order under which the agent was to receive £4,000 as damages for breach of the agreement and costs, and it was ordered that he should recover nothing in respect of the claim made by him for commission and expenses.

The General Commissioners decided that the sum of £4,000 was taxable profits for the year in which it was actually received. Harman J., dismissing the appeal, held that the sum received represented compensation for the profit which the taxpayer would, or might have, made out of the agreement between the breach and the due ending date, and, as such, represented income corresponding to the commission which he would have received if the agreement had been allowed to run. On appeal by the agent from that decision:—

Held, that although the taxpayer's agency business might have suffered a disaster by the breach of the agreement, it could not be said that it was thereby partially destroyed; and the question whether the £4,000 was a taxable profit was ultimately one of fact for the Commissioners, who, on the facts of this case, were entitled to come to the conclusion that it was a taxable profit.

Decision of Harman J. [1955] 1 W.L.R. 1287; [1955] 3 All E.R. 458 affirmed.

APPEAL from Harman J.[1]

The case stated by the Commissioners for the general purposes of the Income Tax Acts for the division of Manchester, so far as relevant, provided: 1. At a meeting of the Commissioners held on March 6, 1952, Albert Wiseburgh (hereinafter referred to as "the taxpayer") appealed against assessments to income tax made upon him for the years and in the amounts following: 1949/1950—£12,000; 1951/1952—£10,000. The two assessments under appeal were made under Schedule D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, in respect of the taxpayer's profits as an agent; and were made in estimated amounts and were alternative assessments.

The only questions for determination by the Commissioners were: (1) whether or not the sum of £4,000 received by the taxpayer in respect of the ending of an agreement with a principal, Gordon Mills Ltd., was wholly or partly taxable; (2) if so, for which year of assessment.

The following facts were proved or agreed: The taxpayer was appointed sole agent of Gordon Mills Ltd. under an agreement made on April 2, 1942, between the company and the taxpayer. The agreement was never given any goodwill value in the taxpayer's books, the legal costs involved in the preparation of the agreement were claimed and allowed as a deduction in the computation of the taxpayer's profits. On or about July 1, 1948, there was a breach of the agreement by the company in circumstances set out in the pleadings in proceedings referred to below. Before these circumstances arose the taxpayer reasonably expected the agreement to continue for several years. His appointment as agent could at that date under the terms of the agreement have been lawfully determined by the company by notice expiring on October 20, 1949.

Proceedings were instituted by the taxpayer against the company whereby he claimed: damages for breach of contract; that an account be taken of the commission and expenses due to him under the terms of the agreement; and payment of the amount found due on the taking of the account.

The company filed a defence to the claim and paid £4,000 into court. One of the assertions in the defence was that the taxpayer was not entitled to any commission or expenses.

After a considerable amount of negotiation the action was settled (without any account being taken) on terms agreed between the parties, which were embodied in an order of the Manchester District Registrar, dated April 20, 1950, whereby it was ordered that the taxpayer should be at liberty to enter judgment against the company for the sum of £4,000 as damages for breach of agreement and for the costs of the action; that he should recover nothing in respect of the claim for commission and expenses; and that the sum of £4,000 paid into court by the company should be paid out to his solicitors in satisfaction of the sum of £4,000 damages. Before the settlement of the action the taxpayer was advised by leading counsel that the claim to commission would have to be abandoned; this advice was accepted by him and he gave his counsel a free hand to settle the action on that basis.

Commission on orders obtained before, but delivered after, July 1, 1948, would have amounted to £3,128. A sum of £807 was due in respect of commission for June, 1948, for goods delivered during that month. The taxpayer had since before the war of 1939–1945 carried on a selling agency business in ladies' garments. The number of agencies had varied from time to time, but during the years ending March 31, 1947, and March 31,

v.
DOMVILLE (INSPECTOR OF TAXES).

1948, there were two agencies which produced commissions as follows:—

	Year ending March 31, 1947.	Year ending March 31, 1948.
Green, Hearn & Co. Ltd.	£4,568	£6,582
Gordon Mills Ltd.	£8,730	£8,223

The commissions during the years ending March 31, 1949, March 31, 1950, and March 31, 1951, were as follows:—

	Year ending March 31, 1949.	Year ending March 31, 1950.	Year ending March 31, 1951.
Green, Hearn & Co. Ltd.	£6,247	£11,711	£11,816
Gordon Mills Ltd.	£1,811	—	—

There was produced to the Commissioners by a representative of the Crown a statement which was accepted by the taxpayer as correctly showing the commissions paid to him by the various agencies he had held, or the various businesses to which he had from time to time rendered services, between 1939 and 1951.

The taxpayer was in a position to hold only a small number of agencies, for (a) he had to devote much time and attention to his work for Gordon Mills Ltd., (b) he could not hold agencies in competing businesses, and (c) he had to try to have one agency in high class goods and one in lesser class goods. The loss of the agency with Gordon Mills Ltd. meant the loss of about half the taxpayer's income. It also inflicted damage to the taxpayer's goodwill, as the circumstances of his dismissal lessened his prestige in the trade, besides reducing the size of his business by about half. It also meant that Gordon Mills Ltd. dealt directly with the customers introduced by the taxpayer. It was to the taxpayer's interests to obtain relatively permanent agencies. In 1946 the taxpayer's wife became the controlling shareholder in a company called K. Wiseburgh Ltd., which manufactured and merchanted many types of clothing, and the taxpayer became the manager of the company's business. Thereafter it was difficult for him to obtain agencies, as there would in many cases be a conflict of interest between his position as an agent for other manufacturers and his position in virtual control of K. Wiseburgh Ltd. Down to the date of the hearing of the appeal the taxpayer had only the one remaining agency, namely that with Green, Hearn & Co. Ltd.

On behalf of the taxpayer it was contended (inter alia): (1) The agreement of April 2, 1942, was the principal source of his earnings, was one of the only two sources which he had at the time of the dispute, and was one of the three permanent agencies which he had possessed. (2) The agreement was wrongfully determined, and the £4,000 was paid for breach of contract. (3) The taxpayer sustained damage to his business structure because of such breach of contract, and the £4,000 was paid and received in respect of that damage. (4) The agreement might have continued indefinitely, and the £4,000 was paid and received with that fact in view. (5) The £4,000 could not be related to any fiscal year or years. (6) The £4,000 was not taxable, as it was a capital receipt of the taxpayer's business. (7) Alternatively, if the £4,000 was paid in respect of commission, as the Inland Revenue contended, it was, to the extent of £3,935, a receipt of the taxpayer's business for the accounting period ended March 31, 1949, and the remaining £65 was not a revenue receipt at all.

On behalf of the Crown it was contended (inter alia): (1) The taxpayer received £4,000 as damages, defined in the particulars of claim as commission that would have been earned by October 20, 1949. The agency for the company was not fundamental to his business organisation and the £4,000 was not for the loss of an enduring asset. The loss was to be regarded as a normal incident of the business carried on by the taxpayer and the sum of £4,000 would be a receipt on revenue account for the year ending March 31, 1951, the basis year for 1951–1952.

Alternatively, the taxpayer was entitled under the agreement to commission amounting to £3,935, being £807 commission due for June, 1948, and £3,128 commission on orders obtained before July 1, the goods being delivered after that date. Notwithstanding anything in the order made by the Manchester District Registrar, the £4,000 paid to the taxpayer by the company was in respect of that commission and expenses. If this were so then the sum of £3,935 should be assessed for 1949/50 as having been earned in the year ending March 31, 1949.

The Commissioners gave their decision as follows: "So far "as they are questions of fact we find as facts, and so far as they "are questions of law we hold: (1) The taxpayer, according to "his returns, carried on business as a manufacturers' agent "at the time he was engaged by Gordon Mills Limited and con-"tinued as such during the whole of the engagement and after "October 20, 1949. (2) According to his statement of claim in "his action against Gordon Mills Limited he claimed that he "had lost the commission which he would otherwise have earned "between July 1, 1948, and October 20, 1949. (3) The terms of "the agreed judgment had no bearing whatsoever on the question "whether the amount awarded was capital or income. (4) The "amount awarded in fact took the place of the commission which "he would have been earning if the engagement had been con-"tinued to October 20, 1949. (5) The sum of £4,000 is taxable "profits for the year in which it was actually received."

The taxpayer appealed to the court. On October 26, 1954, his appeal was dismissed by Harman J., who held that the sum of £4,000 represented compensation for the profit which the taxpayer would or might have made under the agreement between the breach and the due ending date of the agreement and, as such, represented income corresponding to the commission which he would have received if the agreement had been allowed to run.

Cases cited in argument not referred to in the judgments: Henley v. Murray [2]; John Smith & Son v. Moore [3]; Henderson v. Meade-King, Robinson & Co. Ltd. [4]; Inland Revenue Commissioners v. David C. Macdonald & Co. [5]

LORD EVERSHED M.R. In this case I have come to the same conclusion as Harman J. and I think, therefore, that this appeal fails.

The subject-matter involved is the sum of £4,000 which was paid out to the taxpayer by way of settlement of an action which he had brought against a company, Gordon Mills Ltd., the action being based on an alleged breach by Gordon Mills Ltd. by way of repudiation of a contract of agency which the taxpayer had with them at the time. The question, when properly formulated, is whether, within the language of the applicable Income Tax Act, 1918, Schedule D, paragraph 1 (a) (ii), this is properly chargeable as being in respect of "the annual profits "or gains arising or accruing" to the taxpayer from a trade. His trade, in respect of which he admittedly is or was taxable, is that of a sales agent for articles of women's clothing manufactured by various manufacturing companies.

The facts are fully set out in the case stated and it is unnecessary, for the purposes of my judgment, that I should restate them fully. I can sufficiently state the essentials of the matter by reference first to Appendix D to the case which shows that during a number of years beginning in 1939 and ending in 1951 the taxpayer had agencies of this character for a number of manufacturers totalling in all twenty. It is, however, necessary to observe at once that at no one time did the taxpayer hold agencies for twenty such firms or anything like that number. Indeed, at the relevant date, namely, July 1, 1948, when Gordon Mills Ltd. terminated the taxpayer's agency with them, he had two such agencies, one with a company called Green, Hearn & Co., and the other with this company, Gordon Mills Ltd. However, the importance of this schedule lies in the circumstance that during the business life of thirteen years which it covers, the taxpayer's agencies varied in their nature and number from time to time. Some were held for a very short time: some, by the figures, may have represented little more than isolated transactions conducted on a commission basis: others lasted longer. In the case of Green, Hearn & Co. the agency had continued by 1951 for no less than twelve years, and, similarly, the Gordon Mills agency at the relevant date had lasted for seven years or more; but it was in the nature of an agency business of this kind that there might be from time to time changes in the actual agencies held, by the substitution of one for another. I need say no more about this particular agency than that its terms were comprehended in a written agreement, one clause of which provided that it was terminable on either side by twelve months' notice ending on October 20 in any year. It is therefore an incident of importance, in this case, that, if it is to be regarded in any sense as an asset, its quality must be judged by its legal character, and it was an asset liable to determination on relatively short notice. On the other hand, it is fair to say, as Mr. Graham emphasized in his short but forceful speech, that it was obviously in the ordinary expectation of the parties (and the case so finds) that, if all went well, the contract in fact as a business matter would be likely to have gone on, one might say, indefinitely. Unfortunately for him, or perhaps fortunately for him, because I know not the ultimate financial gain or loss, the taxpayer engaged himself in 1948, the year with which we are concerned, as manager for a business, of which his wife was substantially the proprietor, called K. Wiseburgh, Ltd., a business of manufacturing and merchanting garments of the same character, to some extent at least, as those made by Gordon Mills. It was because of that enterprise that Gordon Mills said that he was neglecting his proper obligation to them and had accordingly treated the contract as at an end.

Thereupon the taxpayer issued his writ and by his statement of claim he asked for damages for breach of contract and also for an account of the commission which he alleged was at that date due and unpaid in respect of his past work. It is right to observe that, as pleaded, the damage for breach of contract which the taxpayer alleged was "damage in that he had lost commis-" sion which he would otherwise have earned." He says that the real damage lay not so much in the loss of the commission which would otherwise have been earned but in the loss of the particular contract; but to my mind there is no valid distinction for the present purpose between these two.

The taxpayer might have alleged that the real damage to him, apart from the loss of a certain amount of commission, lay in this: that if the determination were wrongful his goodwill as sales agent in this line of business was thereby seriously impaired. If and in so far as damages were claimed because his goodwill as a sales agent had been impaired, I can well conceive, to say the least of it, that the taxpayer would have had a strong case for saying that such a sum of damages would not be taxable.

The order was an order made by consent. It followed, apparently, after a considerable period of negotiation, for it is dated in April 20, 1950. The Commissioners in their conclusions state that the terms of the judgment had no bearing whatsoever on the question whether the amount awarded was taxable or not. That conclusion was much criticized by Mr. Mustoe, and it was also criticized to some extent by Harman J. If by it the Commissioners meant that the judgment and the language of it were for all purposes wholly irrelevant in any case, I should have agreed with the criticism; but, for my part, I think also that the criticism may be somewhat less than just to the Commissioners. The reason for that view will appear when I have read the order: "Pursuant to the order of the registrar whereby "it was ordered: That the plaintiff [the taxpayer] be at liberty "to enter judgment against the defendants for the sum of "£4,000 as damages for breach of agreement of service and for "costs of the action, . . . That the plaintiff do recover "nothing from the defendants in respect of his claim for com-"mission and expenses"—that is a reference to the second head of the claim which Mr. Mustoe called pre-breach commission—"That the sum of £4,000 paid into court by the "defendants . . . be forthwith paid out to the plaintiff's "solicitors . . . in satisfaction of the said sum of £4,000 "damages: That the action be withdrawn from the list. It is "this day adjudged that the plaintiff recover against the said "defendants £4,000 and costs of the action throughout to be "taxed. . . ." The judgment is at least relevant to this extent. It shows—and the parties were entitled to compromise their action in such terms as they chose—that there was no sum being paid for pre-breach commission. Had it been the other way round, Mr. Mustoe conceded that he would have been in difficulty in saying that unpaid commission paid as a result of a law suit to get payment of it is not taxable. But it seems to me that, once it is conceded, and the judgment makes it clear that this was an agreed sum of damages for breach of this agreement by its repudiation, then the utility of this order is exhausted for our purposes. In other words, it still remains for the court to say whether in the circumstances of this case a general sum of damages for breach of this agreement was "profits or gains arising or accruing" to the taxpayer from his trade.

There is one other inference which must be drawn from the form of the judgment read in the light of the pleadings—and I do not forget that this is a consent order, a settlement when no doubt both parties had considered all their alleged rights and defences—and that is this: I think that, on the face of it, it is impossible for the court to infer that this £4,000 or any part of it must be treated as paid by way of damages for the loss of the taxpayer's goodwill. The form of the pleadings plus the amount of the damages really makes that impossible.

I return, therefore, to the question, was this sum paid by way of damages in respect of this agency contract "profits or "gains" arising from the trade of the taxpayer as a sales agent? Mr. Mustoe's argument had the attraction of simplicity, for it may be put thus: he said that the £4,000 represents what was paid to the taxpayer in exchange for a profit-earning asset which he had lost owing to the breach of the contract by the defendants. That being so, Mr. Mustoe contended, it follows that it is a capital item. I have said that there is an attraction in that argument and if the question were res integra it would be more attractive still; but, it clearly will not do as a test in these cases in the light of the authorities to which we have been referred.

It is true that for the most part the authorities are decisions of the Inner House of the Court of Session in Scotland which do not bind this court; but the Income Tax Acts apply indifferently on either side of the border and, therefore, I should in any case be slow to indicate when sitting in this court an entirely new approach to the incidence of taxation in England from that which I think has now been well established in Scotland. In other words, I feel that we should follow the line of the Scottish decisions and the principle which can be extracted from them.

Faithful to that prelude, I will cite the language of Lord President Normand and say "No infallible criterion emerges from "a citation of the case law. Each case depends upon its own "facts." (Kelsall Parsons & Co. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners.[1]) I do not think it is necessary to go over the cases which have been cited to us; it is fair to say, as Mr. Mustoe put it, that the case I have last mentioned, Kelsall Parsons & Co. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners [1] is perhaps very much at one end of the line and Barr, Crombie & Co. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners [2] is a case very much at the other end of the line. Kelsall Parsons [3] was a case in which the business of the company (for the taxpayer there was a company) was that of agent for manufacturers. They, however, had at the relevant date far more agency contracts than Mr. Wiseburgh had at the relevant date, and, moreover, the sum subject there to the consideration of the Inner House was a sum paid for cancellation of a contract which in any event would have determined in a relatively short time and in regard to which, as Lord Normand says, the taxpayer had no reasonable expectation of its further continuance.

However, Mr. Graham pointed out that the present case is really distinguishable on its facts, and distinguishable in a significant degree from Kelsall Parsons.[3] First, the agencies which Mr. Wiseburgh held were but two. Secondly, as I have said earlier, although the agency which we are considering was expressed to be determinable at relatively short notice, in truth, if all had gone well, there would have been no reason to suppose that it would have been. And thirdly, as the Commissioners pointed out, the effect of the loss of this contract was, quoad the taxpayer's agency business, very substantially to depreciate his earnings; whereas in the Kelsall Parsons case [3] the court pointed out that the earnings of the taxpayer out of the agency business were not much different from what they had been before the cancellation of the material contract. I agree that in respect of those matters the present case differs from that case; but I am unable to agree that those differences are of such significance as to bring the case from the territory, so to speak, of Kelsall Parsons [4] into the land of Barr Crombie.[5] On its facts, if one were content to take the analogy of facts, the present case may be said to be more closely resembling the later case of Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Fleming & Co. (Machinery) Ltd.,[6] and I have already said that I must resist Mr. Mustoe's invitation to refuse to follow the Scottish line of authority.

But, to bring the matter over to what I have called the Barr Crombie [7] land, it must be shown that, in truth and in substance, what the taxpayer parted with was not merely his rights and expectations under a contract entered into in the ordinary course of his trade, but was a parting by him with one of his enduring capital assets, as it is called. It is on that sort of consideration, as I said earlier, that this case might well have been different if the £4,000 had been paid because the taxpayer's goodwill had been damaged. In the Barr Crombie [7] case the agency which was there cancelled amounted to the substance of the whole business of the tax-paying company; its receipts accounted for nearly nine-tenths of the total earnings and its loss necessitated the complete reorganisation of the taxpayer's business, a reduction in its staff, and the taking of new and smaller premises. In effect, a substantial part of the business undertaking had gone. Here, as it seems to me, what has happened in brief is that the taxpayer has been carrying on this business which for thirteen years has shown variations in the actual agreements which it has comprehended; and the business has suffered something of a shock and perhaps something of a disaster by reason of this quarrel with a valuable customer. But beyond that, it seems to me that it is not right to say that the taxpayer had his undertaking as a sales agent partially destroyed or taken away.

The matter being very largely one of degree, which is, as Lord Normand said, a matter of fact, the question in the end is,

I think, one of fact for the Commissioners to find. On the facts of this case it seems to me that the Commissioners were entitled to find, and justified in finding, as they did, without any misdirection of law, that this amount awarded to the taxpayer was a taxable profit; that is to say, a part of the profits or gains arising from the business for the year in question. Harman J. thus expressed himself towards the end of his judgment [8]: "The "taxpayer was a manufacturers' agent. He had other agencies "from time to time and carried on business as an agent, and "one of the incidents of such business is that one agency may "end and another begin. The fact that an agency was a key "agency, and therefore was important to him and represented "half of his income, seems to me to be irrelevant." With the possible exception of substituting "inconclusive" for "irrele- "vant," I agree entirely with that statement; and I agree with what the judge said later: "it was a normal incident in this "kind of business that an agency should come to an end, and the compensation paid is, it seems to me quite clearly, income.

I agree with Harman J.; and I agree with him on the ground that, at the end of it all, it is a legitimate conclusion which the Commissioners on the facts of the case were entitled to find. For these reasons, this appeal fails.

BIRKETT L.J. I am entirely of the same opinion; but, in view of the arguments of Mr. Mustoe and Mr. Graham, I will say one word by way of supplement.

We have been concerned all the time with this sum of £4,000. Towards the end of the discussion Mr. Graham invited us to consider the nature of the £4,000. That was in the submission that he could distinguish the facts in the Kelsall Parsons case [9] from the facts of the present case. What he said was that the damages were in the nature of a sum of money, a surrogatum or quid pro quo for the loss of this contract. He also asked us to consider the nature of the business.

It is perfectly plain that, in all the cases which have been before the courts on this or on a similar topic, the courts have felt an intense difficulty in laying down anything like a precise line that could be applied to the facts of any given case. But what I think they have done now, as emerges from the cases cited to us by Mr. Mustoe, is this: they have said one's duty is, first of all, to examine with care the facts, come to a decision on the primary facts, make such inference as those facts demand, bearing in mind at all times the considerations which have been laid down in the various cases.

As I mentioned during the argument, I think that the most helpful passage was that from Lord Russell's judgment in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Fleming & Co. (Machinery)

Ltd.[10]: "The sum received by a commercial firm as compensation for the loss sustained by the cancellation of a trading contract or the premature termination of an agency agreement may in the recipient's hands be regarded either as a capital receipt or as a trading receipt forming part of the trading profit. It may be difficult to formulate a general principle by reference to which in all cases the correct decision will be arrived at since in each case the question comes to be one of circumstance and degree. When the rights and advantages surrendered on cancellation are such as to destroy or materially to cripple the whole structure of the recipient's profit-making apparatus, involving the serious dislocation of the normal commercial organisation and resulting perhaps in the cutting down of the staff previously required, the recipient of the compensation may properly affirm that the compensation represents the price paid for the loss or sterilisation of a capital asset and is therefore a capital and not a revenue receipt." Then he cites the cases of Van den Berghs Ltd. v. Clark[11] and Barr Crombie & Co. Ltd.,[12] and on the other side Kelsall Parsons & Co.[13] So it is perfectly plain that there is no fixed rule, no precise rule or standard by which we can lay it down and say: "You have come within it or come without it." It is a matter of degree and all the facts of the case must be considered.

The difficulty in this case is this: that nobody quite knows for what the £4,000 was in fact paid. I have been looking at the pleadings, which have not been read in full, and it appears to me that on the pleadings the very clearest issues were raised. I see that in the defence the defendants admitted the letter of July 1, 1948, which puts an end to the contract. They say: "Certainly we wrote it but we were entirely justified in so doing." Then they say in the particulars—and this seems to me a very important matter—"Though the plaintiff [the taxpayer] was bound in accordance with the terms of clause 1 of the agreement of service with the defendants to act as the defendants' sole agent for the export market, the plaintiff during the currency of the said agreement exported articles of a similar nature to those manufactured by the defendants under the name of two firms known as K. Wiseburgh Ltd. and K. Wiseburgh Export Ltd., of each of which said companies the plaintiff had control. Such conduct constituted a breach of his contract with and a dereliction of his duty to the defendants." Then they say that he persistently neglected the agency. Under paragraph (c), I find the gravest allegations are there made: "The plaintiff's conduct towards the defendants who were at all material times his employers was such as completely to " frustrate the purpose of the contract and to indicate complete " lack of faith in and desire to co-operate with them." They refer to certain letters, and say: " the plaintiff in terms refused " to speak on the telephone upon a matter concerning business " affairs with the managing director of the defendants: the plain- " tiff gave express instructions to his staff . . . that they were not " to have any communication by telephone with the defendants," but that it was only to be by correspondence. Then there is this: " at a time when the defendants' selling season was at " its height, the plaintiff refused in a letter dated May 19, 1948, " to canvass further sales on behalf of the defendants." That was pleaded but it was never fought out in the courts. If it were true, the defendants were saying with reference to this selling agreement: " You yourself declined to go on with it, and " at the height of the season for selling these goods you refused " to canvass further—in other words, you dropped the agreement " altogether."

In the reply equally important and serious things were said: " By the letters set out above and by the general tone of " hostility displayed by the defendants in other correspondence " between themselves and the plaintiff . . . and by their refusal " to discuss prices with the plaintiff contrary to clause 11 . . . " and by their failure to keep the plaintiff fully informed as to " stocks . . . and by failure to keep the plaintiff informed as to " their cloth position, the defendants created a situation in which " maintenance of the contractual relationship between the " parties was impossible." All I need say about it is this: First of all, on the pleadings, there were the very gravest allegations by both sides. Secondly we know the action was compromised by this payment of £4,000: but the grounds on which the sum of £4,000 was arrived at are quite impossible to determine. One never knows in these matters. One has heard that settlements are sometimes made a little easier outside court because the presence of one leader was urgently required in another court; but it is impossible to speculate why the £4,000 was paid in this case. When, however, one sees that in the year ending March 31, 1948, the commissions were £8,223, and yet £4,000 only was paid in this case for the ending of this particular contract, it shows how impossible it is to arrive with any certainty at the nature of the payment of £4,000 in any detailed sense.

The taxpayer says that it was a payment " for injury to the " goodwill of my business." I agree with what Lord Evershed M.R. has said about that. In the whole of this statement of claim, detailed as all the complaints are, there is no breath of a suggestion of that kind. It is confined wholly to the loss of commission. All the details in the pleadings, the defence and reply, really go to that purpose.

What the Crown say here is this: If one looks at the cases which have been decided, applying them to the facts as they are now known in the present case, the reasonable inference which we ought to draw from those facts is that this was merely a profit from the trade within Schedule D (1) (a) (ii) of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and was not a sale of a capital asset as the taxpayer contends. I have been troubled all the way through in this case on the question of the two Wiseburgh companies. I can understand it being said: "I had two contracts and those "were the whole of my business. You took one away and you "left me with only the one contract, and in that respect you "have injured my profit-making apparatus. You have taken "away a capital asset of value." But one must remember what are the facts in this case. The contention was raised in the pleadings: that, so far as the asset about which this complaint was made, the taxpayer would not go on with it, and it was on that ground the defendants say that they were entitled to write that letter of July 1. He had declined at the height of that season to comply with the agency agreement and they were therefore justified in doing what they did. We do not know what was the extent of the K. Wiseburgh business, and we are told they were limited companies, of which he was the manager. It was not an agency in the ordinary sense. If the truth be that this man was concerned to say: "Here am I with a profit-"able agency, it is true, but I can do much better for myself by "having two companies of my own under my own control and "I will do it at the expense of this agreement," it seems to me a little difficult for that man to say: "I want damages for the "injury which you have done to my profit-making apparatus" when, on the true facts, it may very well be that the profit-making apparatus had been changed by his own free will. I have been troubled throughout this case by that consideration, because we do not know what was the extent of the Wiseburgh trade. We only have the allegations which are made that, so far as the export trade was concerned, taking goods which in the ordinary way might have gone from the agency with Gordon Mills Ltd., and all those goods went from Wiseburgh. We know there is that allegation and the further one that the taxpayer himself had by letter declined to go on with the agreement. These things have not been tried, but they are surely matters which must be taken into consideration when it is said by one side that this is for the loss of a capital asset, and on the other that this is a trade profit arising in the ordinary way from your profits under Schedule D.

C. A.

Birkett L.J.

I do not think it is necessary to add anything further. Harman J., who gave consideration to this matter, came to the conclusion that the Commissioners were perfectly justified in their findings as they stated them, and he upheld them; and I need only add that in this court nothing that I have heard leads me to suppose that the Commissioners fell into error, and certainly nothing that for one moment makes me feel that Harman J. fell into error.

For my own part, I would dismiss the appeal.

ROXBURGH J. I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Revenue—Income tax—Profits of trade—Company—Resignations from agency and secretaryship to another company—Payment by third party of sum in consideration of resignation—Whether taxable as trading receipt—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 & 9 Geo. 5, c. 4), Sched. D.

The taxpayers, a mining finance company, provided agency, secretarial and other similar services in London and Johannesburg for a number of companies and the receipts and outgoings in respect of such services were included in its assessment to tax under Schedule D, Case I, of the Income Tax Act, 1952.

Together with the trustees of one F., the taxpayers held a substantial shareholding in the K. company, a South African company, and they had a contract with that company under which they provided agency and secretarial services for a remuneration. In 1949 the taxpayers and the F. trustees sold their shares in the K. company to certain purchasers who, in accordance with the agreement of sale, paid to the taxpayers £20,000 in consideration of their vacating their office as secretaries and agents; of that sum they retained £16,138 and paid the balance to the F. trustees. The sum retained was credited to reserve account in the balance sheet as "amount received during 1949 as compensation for loss of office."

On being assessed to income tax in respect of this sum, the taxpayers appealed to the General Commissioners, who found that it was a trading receipt and dismissed the appeal. Harman J. affirmed the decision of the Commissioners. On appeal:—

Held, (1) that the making of agency contracts was part of the taxpayer's business and the cancellation of the contract in question in no way affected the "profit-making apparatus" of the taxpayer and that the Commissioners were entitled to find that the sum of £16,138 represented profits or gains of the taxpayer arising in the ordinary course of its trade.

(2) That the fact that the sum in question was paid by a third person, not a party to the agency contract, was not material, since it was clearly established that the question of liability to tax had to be determined having regard to the nature of the payment in the recipient's hands.

Decision of Harman J. [1955] 1 W.L.R. 1314; [1955] 3 All E.R. 779 affirmed.

Appeal from Harman J.[1]

The case stated, so far as relevant, provided:

At meetings of the Commissioners on October 18 and 25, 1954, the Anglo-French Exploration Co. Ltd. (hereinafter called "Anglo-French") appealed against an estimated assessment to income tax made in respect of the profits of its trade or business for the year ended April 5, 1951, in a sum of £50,000, less capital allowances £100.

The question for the determination of the Commissioners was whether or not, in the circumstances, a sum of £16,138 4s. 2d. (part of a total sum of £20,000) received from Philip Hill Securities Corporation Ltd., was a trading receipt which should be included in the computation of its profits for income tax purposes.

The circumstances, which had been agreed between the parties, were as follows:

Anglo-French was a public company incorporated in the United Kingdom in 1889 under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1886. Its registered office was in, and control of the company was exercised by the board of directors from, London. It had a branch office in Johannesburg. It carried on the business of a mining finance company and its profits were assessed to tax under Schedule D, Case I.

For many years, also, Anglo-French had provided agency, secretarial and other similar services in London and Johannesburg for a number of companies, and the receipts and outgoings in respect of those services were included in Anglo-French's Case I assessment. In 1949 Anglo-French were providing such services both in South Africa and London for three companies and in London, only, for a further five companies.

Anglo-French had either (a) provided such services for companies without holding shares in the companies concerned, or (b) held shares in companies for which it did not provide such services, or (c) provided such services for companies in which it had also held shares. The names of the eight companies included that of "Kleinfontein Estates & Township Ltd. [Year "of Commencement 1899]." There had been (with three immaterial exceptions), for upwards of the past fifteen years, no changes in the companies for which Anglo-French had so acted. The annual rates of fees and rents receivable by Anglo-French from the above-mentioned companies for the provision of secretarial services and office accommodation, as at March/April, 1949, was set out in a schedule to the Case.

Kleinfontein Estates & Township, Ltd. (hereinafter referred to as "Kleinfontein") for whom Anglo-French provided secretarial services in London and Johannesburg and in which Anglo-French held shares, was at all material times a public company incorporated in South Africa and carrying on business there.

From June 19, 1931, the terms and conditions on which Anglo-French provided such services to Kleinfontein in Johannesburg were regulated by a formal agreement between the two companies, which, by its terms provided that it should continue in force from year to year until determined by either party giving six months' calendar notice. The agreement further provided, inter alia, that Kleinfontein should by way of remuneration pay to Anglo-French £1,200 per annum and a further sum of £60 per annum for rental of office accommodation. This remuneration was subsequently, by mutual agreement, increased to £1,500 per annum.

In addition to acting as secretary of Kleinfontein in Johannesburg and providing all necessary secretarial services, Anglo-French also provided similar services for Kleinfontein in London. The fee paid by Kleinfontein to Anglo-French for these services in London was £60 per annum.

In May, 1949, Anglo-French, together with another friendly shareholder (the estate of the late Sir George Farrar), held a majority of the shares in Kleinfontein. Anglo-French had never had a controlling interest in Kleinfontein.

In 1947 negotiations took place for the sale of Anglo-French's share in Kleinfontein but, in the events which happened, these negotiations were subsequently broken off.

In May, 1948, and March, 1949, further negotiations took place regarding a possible sale by Anglo-French of its shares in Kleinfontein. On this occasion the offer to purchase (which was in no way connected with the 1947 negotiations) was made on behalf of Philip Hill Securities Corporation Ltd. (hereinafter referred to as "Philip Hill").

Ultimately, by a letter dated March 29, 1949, Philip Hill made a formal offer to purchase from Anglo-French and certain other shareholders, at the price of 35s. each per share, not less than 70,000 shares of 5s. each fully paid in Kleinfontein. By clause 6 of the terms and conditions set out in the letter Anglo-French was to tender its resignation as agents and secretaries to Kleinfontein, and Philip Hill was to pay to Anglo-French on the tender of that resignation a sum of £20,000. This offer was accepted by Anglo-French.

The participation of the trustees of the estate of the late Sir George Farrar was confirmed by a letter to the Anglo-French manager in Johannesburg in which they stated that they would be willing to sell to Philip Hill, at 35s. per share, the shares in Kleinfontein held by them. A circular was sent to the shareholders, who had not participated in the transaction, informing them that Anglo-French and the George Farrar trustees had accepted an offer from Philip Hill of 35s. per share for their respective shares in Kleinfontein amounting in all to 70,491 shares of 5s. each out of a total of 85,000 shares. They were also informed that, in consideration of its vacating the office of secretary and agent of Kleinfontein, Anglo-French had been paid a sum of £20,000.

The transactions were finally completed and the resignation of Anglo-French from the office of secretary and agent of Kleinfontein and the resignation of the London Committee of Kleinfontein were also tendered and accepted with immediate effect.

Having resigned from their office with Kleinfontein, Anglo-French duly received the sum of £20,000 from Philip Hill. After paying a proportional part to the George Farrar trustees in accordance with an agreement with them, Anglo-French retained £16,138 4s. 2d. That sum was credited to reserve account in the published balance sheet of Anglo-French and described as "Amount received during 1949 as compensation "for loss of office." Reference to this sum was made in the report of directors in the same year as follows: "During the "year the company relinquished its office as secretaries and "agents to Kleinfontein Estates and Township Ltd. An amount "of £16,138 received as compensation for loss of office has "been placed to the credit of general reserve."

On behalf of Anglo-French it was contended: (a) that in order to ascertain whether a payment is a capital or a revenue receipt every case must be determined on its own particular facts; (b) that the agreed facts in this case indicate that the sum of £16,138 4s. 2d. was part of the price, viz., £20,000 paid by a third party (Philip Hill) to Anglo-French in consideration of its agreeing to give up an agency contract and that, accordingly, the case was distinguished from the type of case where the payment was received by an agent from his principal; (c) that, having regard to its terms and the surrounding circumstances, the said agency contract together with the right to exercise the duties thereunder was a capital asset of Anglo-French and its surrender at the instance of Philip Hill was a transaction analogous to a sale of a capital asset; (d) that the said sum of £16,138 4s. 2d. was therefore a capital receipt and not a trading receipt of Anglo-French; (e) that the appeal should be allowed.

It was contended by the Crown: (a) that the said sum of £16,138 4s. 2d. was received by Anglo-French as compensation for the loss of one of its agencies in the ordinary course of its business and not in consideration of a sale or any such analogous transaction; (b) that in fact the said agency contract and the right to perform the duties thereunder did not constitute an asset, which Anglo-French could or did sell, and further, that the fact that the payment of compensation for its loss was made by a third party was immaterial; (c) alternatively, as Anglo-French was a mining finance company, that if any such sale or analogous transaction did take place, which was not admitted, the proceeds thereof were profits which arose from a financial dealing; (d) that in either event the said payment of £16,138 4s. 2d. was a revenue receipt and therefore taxable profit; (e) that the appeal should be dismissed.

The Commissioners held that the £16,138 4s. 2d. was a trading receipt of the appellants and must be included in its profits for the purpose of income tax and the appeal failed.

Harman J. dismissed the appeal of Anglo-French from the decision of the Commissioners.

Anglo-French appealed.

H. H. Monroe for the appellant company.

Roy Borneman Q.C. and Sir Reginald Hills for the Crown.

The following cases were referred to argument and were not cited in the judgment: Henley v. Murray [2]; Greyhound Racing Association (Liverpool) Ltd. v. Cooper (Inspector of Taxes) [3]; Henderson v. Meade-King, Robinson & Co. Ltd. [4]; MacDonald v. Inland Revenue Commissioners. [5]

LORD EVERSHED M.R. The question involved in the present case relates to a sum of £16,138 4s. 2d. which was received by the appellant company, Anglo-French Exploration Company Ltd. in the year 1949.

It is right that, at the outset of my judgment, I should refer to the terms of the schedule under which the claim is made, namely, Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918, which was the Act of Parliament then in force. Its terms are very familiar, but I hope I shall be excused if I recite them: "Tax under this "schedule shall be charged in respect of—(a) The annual "profits or gains arising or accruing— . . . (iii) to any person ". . . from any trade, profession, employment, or vocation, "whether the same be respectively carried on in the United "Kingdom." I have thought it right and relevant to refer to the terms of that schedule because, in my judgment, Mr. Borneman correctly reminded us that the cases of individual persons sought to be charged under Schedule E of the Act, where the charge is "in respect of every employment of profit," do not form a safe guide to cases under Schedule D, at least as a general proposition. We must consider the correctness or otherwise of the assessment here made in the light of the language which I have read of Schedule D.

The question, so interpreted, as it is before us can be thus expressed: Does this sum of £16,000 odd represent profits or gains of the Anglo-French Exploration Company Ltd. arising from its trade? In other words, was it a sum received by the appellant company in the ordinary course or stream of its trading operations?

The facts of the case are not in dispute, and since they are fully recited in the case stated, it is unnecessary for me to repeat the whole of the narrative. The essential facts, however, are as follows. The Anglo-French Exploration Company Ltd.—I will henceforth call it "Anglo-French"—was formed as an English company at the end of last century: its business being that of a mining and finance company particularly concerned, according to the terms of the case stated, with seeking scope for the investment of capital in South Africa.

Among the South African companies in which Anglo-French held for many years a substantial shareholding was the Kleinfontein Estates and Township Ltd., which I will henceforth call "Kleinfontein." In that company Anglo-French held, at all relevant dates, rather less than one-third of the total of its share capital which consisted of shares of 5s. 0d. denomination. A similar but slightly larger shareholding in Kleinfontein was at all material times held by persons who were the trustees of the late Sir George Farrar. Anglo-French and the Farrar trustees had each of them two nominee directors on the board of Kleinfontein, but, in fact, the fees, which were paid to the Anglo-French nominee directors, were in turn paid over by them to Anglo-French.

In addition to that shareholding interest, Anglo-French for many years acted, under the terms of a written agreement and certain correspondence, as agents and secretaries of Kleinfontein for the annual fee of £1,500 sterling. The substance of the obligation as agents and secretaries undertaken by Anglo-French was that they provided office accommodation and office staff for Kleinfontein in Johannesburg. The agreement was determinable by six months' notice on either side; but in practice, and so long as Anglo-French and the Farrar trustees co-operated together, Kleinfontein would not be able to determine the agreement against the wishes of Anglo-French. In May, 1949, Philip Hill Securities Corporation Ltd., another English company, made an offer for the shares of the Kleinfontein company at a price of 35s. 0d. per share. It was also part of that offer that, when the stage was reached whereby more than 50 per cent. of the issued shares of Kleinfontein had been acquired, the Philip Hill Company would pay the sum of £20,000 in consideration of the resignation by Anglo-French of its office as agents and secretaries.

As Mr. Monroe has said, and said rightly, the true transaction must be carefully analysed. I will read part of the paragraph in the offer which related to that last-mentioned matter. "Subject to your company's acceptance of this offer and upon "delivery to our company of 43,000 of the said shares"—43,000 being just over 50 per cent.—"with transfer forms as aforesaid "attached thereto, your company will tender its resignation as "agents and secretaries to the Kleinfontein Company, acceptance "of which we undertake to procure forthwith upon its being "tendered, and upon the tender of such resignation we shall pay "to your company in cash the sum of £20,000." Those offers, the offer to buy the shares at 35s. 0d. each, and the offer in respect of resignation by Anglo-French, were accepted by Anglo-French. In due course, and in accordance with the terms of the arrangement, the £20,000 having been received, part of it was paid over by Anglo-French to the Farrar trustees, the figure of £16,138 4s. 2d. representing the balance of the £20,000 retained by Anglo-French.

I observe two things: (1) the £20,000 was not part of the purchase price of the shares, as was indeed conceded in the courts below, and as has been here conceded on the part of the Crown. Had it been otherwise, had it been part of the purchase price, then either Anglo-French would have got more than the other shareholders for their shares (which is inconsistent with the Philip Hill company's offer) or, to avoid that result, Anglo-French would have had to distribute £20,000 rateably among all the shareholders; (2) the agency agreement being on the face of it determinable by six months' notice, it was quite plainly only worth a sum like £20,000 so long as Anglo-French and its friends, the Farrar trustees, could control the Kleinfontein Company. That plain fact is recognised by the terms of the offer, as also by the distribution by Anglo-French of the £20,000 when they received it.

Mr. Monroe's argument before us, which, if he will allow me to say so, was presented with cogency and lucidity, was to this effect: (1) The £20,000 was paid in truth as consideration for the giving up or destruction, as distinct from the mere discharge, of the agency, that being, he said, the legal effect of the true analysis of the bargain as recorded in the document; (2) it is nihil ad rem that £20,000 was far in excess of the true value of the agreement, since the parties to the arrangement could put any price they liked upon it; (3) it is also nihil ad rem that the £20,000 was, so to say, tied up with the trading transaction, namely, the sale of the shares. It was a separate bargain and constituted a capital payment. (4) It is nihil ad rem likewise that Anglo-French chose to divide the £20,000 between themselves and the Farrar trustees, as they did. (5) It therefore follows from the first proposition that the sum received was a capital payment in the hands of Anglo-French, because it was in truth paid to, and received by, them for the destruction, the assigning, the giving up, or whatever phrase you like to use, of a source of income, videlicet, a capital asset.

The Commissioners rejected this argument. They found that the sum in question was a trade receipt, meaning thereby, as I understand, a receipt by Anglo-French in the ordinary course of their trade. In my judgment, the Commissioners were entitled, on the facts, so to find, and in so finding they made no error in law.

If the matter were res integra, I think that there is much to be said for the simple view that a sum of money received in consideration for the giving up or destruction of an agreement under which you look to earn an annual sum is capital and not income: for in such case the sum received might be described fairly as the capitalised equivalent at the present time of income prospects. But the question remains, not whether that sum in some senses or in some contexts might sensibly be called a "capital" payment, but whether within the terms of Schedule D it is a profit or gain arising from the trade of the recipient.

And the matter is not in any case res integra. The line of cases to which we have had our attention directed, starting from the well-known trilogy: Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Newcastle Breweries Ltd.,[1] Short Brothers v. Inland Revenue Commissioners,[2] and Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Northfleet Coal & Ballast Co. Ltd.,[3] seem to me to emphasise that sums received for the cancellation of an agency or of other similar agreements which have been entered into by the recipient in the ordinary course of its trade will themselves, prima facie, be regarded as received in the ordinary course of trade unless the transaction involves a parting by the recipient with a substantial part of its business undertaking. The case of Barr Crombie & Co. Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners[4] was a case of that exceptional character.

On the other hand, we have the cases to which we were referred in this case (as also in the case we decided recently of Wiseburgh v. Domville[5]) of Kelsall Parsons & Co. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue,[6] and Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Fleming & Co. (Machinery) Ltd.[7]

I have referred to the case of Wiseburgh v. Domville[8] in which we gave judgment since the first hearing of this case now under consideration, and I may perhaps repeat in this case what I there said: that we have not thought it right to express a different view from that which has been persistently entertained in the Court of Session in Scotland, where, as it happens, the majority of these cases seem to have arisen for determination.

I will make one or two references to the judgments in Kelsall Parsons & Co.[9] and Fleming & Co.[10] My first reference is to the judgment of Lord President Normand in the former case. The Lord President said[11]: "It is not necessary that I should review "all the authorities which were cited to us, but I must advert "to the contentions ably urged by the appellants' counsel that "the determination of the Commissioners is contrary to principles "recognised in some of these authorities. Counsel maintained "that a payment for loss of a 'profit-making apparatus' was "necessarily a capital payment in the hands of the recipient who "received it as compensation for such loss. This proposition is, "I think, too vague and too wide. I find it impossible to "reconcile with some of the decided cases." The Lord President then referred, among others, to the case of Short Brothers Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners.[12] He continued[13]: "These "two cases were referred to by Lord Macmillan in his speech in "Van den Berghs Ltd. v. Clark,[14] and I think they can be treated "as of high authority since they passed the scrutiny of the House "of Lords without adverse comment. Then it was urged that "the whole structure of the appellants' business was affected by "the cancellation and that on the authority of Van den Berghs "Ltd. v. Clark[14] the payment should therefore be treated as "a capital payment. I have already given reasons for thinking "that the structure of the business carried on by the appellants "was in fact, as the nature of the business required, so designed "as to absorb such shocks as the cancellation of a single, albeit "an important, agency contract."

I will next make a reference to the leading judgment of Lord President Cooper in Fleming's case.[15] That was a case in which a contract had been cancelled and a restrictive covenant had also been entered into. The Lord President said: "It is conceded by "the Inland Revenue that the £590 and the £800" (being the values paid in respect of the restrictive covenants) "are not "revenue payments and I imagine that this concession would "equally have been made even if the proportions allocated to "those parts of the agreement had been far larger. It is against "the £5,320 alone that the challenge is directed, and taking the "agreement at its face value the Inland Revenue maintain that "clause 1 specifically records simply the loss by a selling agency "of one agency (out of eight which they held in 1948) and that "such a loss is or must be treated as a normal trading risk. I "can see no satisfactory answer to this contention unless we "can impart a special meaning to clause 1 by reading along with "it the rest of the agreement." Lord Russell put the matter thus[16]: "It may be difficult to formulate a general principle by "reference to which in all cases the correct decision will be "arrived at since in each case the question comes to be one of "circumstance and degree. When the rights and advantages "surrendered on cancellation are such as to destroy or materially "to cripple the whole structure of the recipient's profit-making "apparatus, involving the serious dislocation of the normal "commercial organisation and resulting perhaps in the cutting "down of the staff previously required, the recipient of the "compensation may properly affirm that the compensation "represents the price paid for the loss or sterilisation of a capital "asset and is therefore a capital and not a revenue receipt." Finally, Lord Keith concluded his judgment thus [17]: "I think "accordingly that the sum of £5,320 must be regarded as com-"pensation for loss of profits and not for loss of a profit-earning "asset. This may seem a large sum for loss of profits to an "agency terminable at will: but it may reflect the long period "during which the agency had continued and a desire on the "part of Imperial Chemical Industries Ltd. to act generously. "Also reasonable notice would have been required to terminate "the agency and there might have been contentious questions "as to what notice was required. Compensation in lieu of notice "would in my opinion quite clearly be a revenue receipt."

Accepting the law applicable as being that which may be derived from these cases, Mr. Monroe was, in effect, compelled to say either one of two things: namely, either (1) that the agency contract in this case was a capital asset, and, therefore, that the proceeds of sale of that asset must be capital, unless the business of the company involves trading or dealing in that kind of asset; or (2) that the agency contract here was so long-standing and so important to the company as to distinguish the present case on the facts or as a matter of degree from such cases as Kelsall Parsons [18] and Fleming.[19]

It is true that the facts show that Anglo-French held some eight agency and secretarial contracts and had done so for a considerable time with little variation. Nevertheless, the making of such contracts was part of the business of Anglo-French, and the cancellation of this one contract in no sense affected the "profit-making apparatus" of the company which retained its offices and staff, etc., in Johannesburg exactly as before. In my judgment, Mr. Monroe's first alternative proposition is really inconsistent with the cases. The taxpayers in the Kelsall Parsons case [20] and the Fleming case [21] were not dealers in agency contracts.

Mr. Monroe's second alternative answer is a question of fact and degree. As I have said, at the beginning of this judgment,

I think that the Commissioners were fully entitled to find the conclusion of fact which they did.

I should add that the fact that the £20,000 was paid, not by the Kleinfontein company, but by a stranger to the agency contract, namely, the Philip Hill company, in my judgment, is immaterial. It has been clearly established that a question of this sort must be determined by having regard to the nature of the payment in the recipient's hands. I, therefore, think that Harman J. arrived at an entirely correct conclusion in this case. He said at the end of his judgment [22]: "Apart from the holding "of the shares, the secretaryship was worth little or nothing. It "was only the appellants' special position that enabled them to "obtain this money. It was in fact a sum earned in the course "of the company's trade, namely, the sale of shares, and, even "though not part of the purchase price, was only earned because "of the holding of the shares and by way of inducement to part "with them. On this analysis, as it seems to me, this was "money earned by the company in the course of its trade and "therefore a trading receipt and must be charged to tax "accordingly."

I agree with that conclusion, and I think that this appeal fails and must be dismissed.

JENKINS L.J. I agree, and I have nothing I can usefully add.

BIRKETT L.J. I also am of the same opinion, and also have nothing to add.

Appeal dismissed.

nuisance as constituting a sensible interference with the comfortable and convenient enjoyment of neighbouring premises.

The plaintiffs sought an injunction restraining the defendants from using residential premises in the West End of London for the purposes of prostitution, and alleged that the activities complained of seriously interfered with the comfortable and convenient enjoyment of their nearby dwelling-houses and had an adverse effect on the value of those houses for residential purposes. Wynn-Parry J. ordered that the defendants be restrained until trial or further order from using, causing or permitting the premises to be used for the purposes of prostitution, and he ordered them to pay the costs of the motion forthwith:—

Held, that the plaintiffs had made out a sufficient case to justify protection of their rights pending the trial of the action but that the form of the order should be amended to comply with the usual practice of the Chancery Division by limiting the prohibition against use for the purposes complained of to use "in the manner "complained of by the plaintiffs in this action or otherwise so as "to cause a nuisance to the plaintiffs or either of them" and by ordering the defendants to pay to the plaintiffs their costs of the motion in any event.

Decision of Wynn-Parry J. affirmed.

Appeal from Wynn-Parry J.

On November 29, 1955, Frank Thompson-Schwab and Harold Hyam Wingate, of 13 and 8 Chesterfield Street, Westminster, W.1, respectively, issued a writ claiming an injunction to restrain the defendants, Blanche Marie Costaki and Caroline Sullivan, from using, causing or permitting to be used, the premises 12 Chesterfield Street for the purpose of prostitution. Notice of motion for an interlocutory injunction was given on December 9, 1955. The evidence in support of the motion was, in substance, that the first plaintiff, Frank Thompson-Schwab, lived at 13 Chesterfield Street adjoining the premises in question, with his family, which included a young son, and that he employed there for the purpose of his domestic affairs three young girls. He said that until the events of which he complained began in the autumn of 1955, Chesterfield Street, though not far distant from streets with an unsavoury reputation, had remained a good class residential street not affected by the activities of common prostitutes and that the activities of which he complained at 12 Chesterfield Street seriously depreciated the value of his house as a residence and seriously interfered with the comfortable and convenient enjoyment of his house as a residence.

His evidence and that of his co-plaintiff was supported by that of three inquiry agents who made observations at various dates in October and November, 1955. The substance of their evidence was that the two defendants during the relevant period were making use of 12 Chesterfield Street as a resort while carrying on their practices as prostitutes; they were, that is to say, leaving those premises, walking for the purpose of solicitation towards Curzon Street, returning to the house with the men whom they had solicited, and then the men would leave the house and the women would leave after them. On December 13, 1955, Wynn-Parry J. ordered "that the defendants be restrained "until after judgment in this action or until further order whether "themselves or by their servants or agents or any of them or "otherwise howsoever from using or causing or permitting to be "used the premises . . . for the purposes of prostitution." He ordered the defendants forthwith to pay the costs of the motion.

The defendants appealed.

Ingram J. Lindner Q.C. and B. B. Stenham for the defendants.

Charles Russell Q.C. and Maurice Berkeley for the plaintiffs.

In addition to the case referred to in the judgments the following were cited in argument: Tod-Heatly v. Benham [1]; Ives v. Brown [2]; Metropolitan Asylum District Board v. Hill [3]; Cunard v. Antifyre Ltd. [4]; Malone v. Laskey [5]; Attorney-General v. Corporation of Nottingham [6]; Dewar v. City and Suburban Racecourse Co. [7]; Walter v. Selfe [8]; Reg. v. Grey [9]; Fleming v. Hislop [10]; St. Helen's Smelting Co. v. Tipping [11]; D. C. Thompson & Co. Ltd. v. Deakin. [12]

LORD EVERSHED M.R. The question raised by this appeal is a matter of some public interest and, I do not doubt, some public importance too. [His Lordship stated the facts set out above and referred to the order made by Wynn-Parry J. He continued:] Mr. Lindner and Mr. Stenham, for the defendants, have put the first plank in their case boldly, thus: they say that the law of nuisance, as it has been developed from the ancient assize, has never comprehended activities of this kind which, they say, though possibly shocking to the susceptibilities of ordinary people, does not in any material, that is physical, way interfere with the land of the plaintiffs or their use of it. That such is their case—whether entirely of their own motion or not I do not pause to inquire—is perhaps made plainer by the circumstance that the defence which they have, as we were told, put in makes it clear that, according to their submission, they should be free (that is, without impinging upon the civil rights of any other person) to use these premises for the purposes of prostitution to their heart's content and in any way they like. That certainly seems a bold plea. But Mr. Lindner has pointed out with truth that no case has come before the courts in which this kind of activity has been held to constitute a common law nuisance.

THOMPSON-SCHWAB v. COSTAKI.
Lord Evershed M.R.

I have said that the present appeal relates to an interlocutory order. I do not think it would be right (and I certainly do not in all the circumstances think it necessary) that I should attempt any exposition or any definitive view of the wrong known as nuisance. For the purposes of this motion I am content to take as correct (as did Wynn-Parry J.) the following passage in paragraph 970 of Clerk and Lindsell's book on Torts (1954), 11th ed., p. 561: "A private nuisance may be and usually is caused by "a person doing on his own land something which he is lawfully "entitled to do. His conduct only becomes a nuisance when the "consequences of his acts are not confined to his own land but "extend to the land of his neighbour by"—then (1) and (2) are inapplicable here—"(3) unduly interfering with his neighbour "in the comfortable and convenient enjoyment of his land."

The forms which activities constituting actionable nuisance may take are exceedingly varied, and there is the highest authority for saying that they are not capable of precise or close definition. If the principle is rightly stated in the passage which I have read, then it must depend upon the facts of each particular case whether the conditions, which I have stated as required to constitute a nuisance, are satisfied; and in considering whether they are satisfied or not the court must, I apprehend, apply to the matter the usages of civilized society as they may be at the relevant date.

In Sedleigh-Denfield v. O'Callaghan[1] Lord Wright said[2]: "It is impossible to give any precise or universal formula, but "it may broadly be said that a useful test is perhaps what is "reasonable according to the ordinary usages of mankind living "in society, or more correctly in a particular society. The forms "which nuisance may take are protean."

In the years 1955 and 1956 I daresay that the activities of prostitutes are less taboo in ordinary polite conversation than they were a hundred years ago; and it is true that so far as the evidence in this case goes there is nothing about the activities of the two defendants which is shown to be unlawful in the sense of being illegal or criminal. But it does not, to my mind, follow at all that their activities should, therefore, be regarded as free from the risk or possibility that they cause a nuisance in the proper sense of that term to a neighbour merely because they do not impinge upon the senses—for example, the nose or the ear—as would the emanation of smells or fumes or noises. In other words, the test as it seems to me (and I adopt it for the purposes of this appeal) is that which I have stated, namely, whether what is being done interferes with the plaintiffs in the comfortable and convenient enjoyment of their land, regard being had, to borrow Lord Wright's language, to the usages in this matter of civilized society, and regard being also had to the character, as proved, of the neighbourhood.

The plaintiffs have shown, in my opinion, a sufficient prima facie case to the effect that the activities being conducted at No. 12 Chesterfield Street are not only open, but they are notorious, and such as force themselves upon the sense of sight at least of the residents in No. 13. The perambulations of the prostitutes and of their customers is something which is obvious, which is blatant, and which, as I think, the first plaintiff has shown prima facie to constitute not a mere hurt of his sensibilities as a fastidious man, but so as to constitute a sensible interference with the comfortable and convenient enjoyment of his residence, where live with him his wife, his son and his servants.

It appears to me, therefore, that for the purposes with which we are concerned—namely, the protection of the plaintiffs' rights pending a trial—there was ample justification for the judge using his discretion, to grant an injunction. The exact extent and character of the alleged nuisance will be judged when oral evidence is given, and it will then no doubt be possible to form a closer view of the interference and inconvenience than appears from the written word in an affidavit.

I must turn now to see what is said on the other side, because I must pass also to the secondary matter which Mr. Lindner has argued, namely, the form of the relief granted. The first defendant, Blanche Marie Costaki, has put in no evidence whatever; and it is plain from the manner in which her case has been conducted, let alone her defence, that she in no sense refutes the allegations made about her. It is said that her proved use of the premises for the purposes of prostitution amounts to a very few isolated instances. I do not in fact agree. The incidents are no doubt few in number, but I do not think they are isolated. She does not state, nor do we know, what interest (if any) either defendant has in the premises No. 12 Chesterfield Street. It would, of course, be a relevant circumstance (though I am not pursuing this matter) if they had some proprietary interest in the premises. Caroline Sullivan, on the other hand, states in an affidavit—which, again, in no way refutes the much more detailed allegations about her activities—that shortly before the issue of the writ (but plainly, I observe, when she knew that proceedings were imminent) she ceased to resort to No. 12 Chesterfield Street for the purposes of prostitution, and she says in that affidavit that it was not her intention to resort there again. An undertaking was offered at some stage in the court below on her part, but it has not been renewed here; and having regard to the admitted (for so it really is) facts about her activities right up to a day or two before the issue of the writ, I can see no good reason why the relief which the judge thought it right to grant should not also be granted against her.

Let me say one other thing which might have been said earlier. It is, I should have thought, obvious, having regard to the proximity of other streets with a less savoury reputation, that if this kind of use of houses is allowed to creep into Chesterfield Street, the whole character of the street might very soon and very seriously change for the worse. That, I think, is a circumstance which it is proper to bear in mind in considering whether, pending the trial, an injunction should be granted to protect the plaintiffs in their use of their own residences. But the question remains: whether it is right that the form of the injunction should be of the absolute and unqualified character which I have read? The phrase "for the purposes of prostitu-" tion" is one, I think, that might be open to more than one possible meaning. It might be said, or it might not be said, to include the case where a woman lived in a house in the position of a kept woman, not indulging in promiscuous activities, but living there in sin with one man. Such an activity might well not constitute a nuisance.

I am, indeed, clear in my own mind, that the extreme views which might be urged on either side could not be sustained. It could not, I think, be sustained—if the words "for the purposes "of prostitution" have their widest possible significance—that every use of a house for such purposes must constitute a nuisance. But I am equally clear (as I have perhaps already sufficiently indicated) that it is not possible to assert that no use of premises for the purposes of prostitution could cause a nuisance. It may be said, perhaps, that in regard to such an activity as prostitution, it would be contra bonos mores for the court to involve itself in any inquiry of its extent or exact character. On the other hand it has, so far as my experience goes, not been the practice of the Chancery Division, in granting interlocutory relief, to grant it in the extreme, absolute and unqualified form which we have here; and on the whole, therefore, I think it is better that the usual practice should be maintained, and that the form of injunction should be qualified in the more usual fashion by adding at the end "in the manner "complained of by the plaintiffs in this action or otherwise so "as to cause a nuisance to the plaintiffs or either of them."

I make that suggested qualification so as to be in accord with normal practice, which I think on the whole should not be departed from in the present case. But I also wish to make it clear that for the purposes of this motion the difference is one of form rather than substance and is in truth academic only; for the words that I have used will make it quite plain that the continuation by either of these women of the activities which are described in the evidence would constitute a breach of the injunction. The question of the proper form of any injunction granted at the trial can then be further considered in light of the facts finally proved.

There remains also the question of costs. It is again, in my experience, unusual to provide (as this order provides) that the defendants should pay forthwith on taxation the costs of the motion. I am not saying that such an order is not within the discretion of the judge in appropriate cases. But I need not pursue that aspect of it because Mr. Russell is quite content (and again I daresay the point is quite academic) that the order should again be varied to conform with more usual practice, and that the order as to costs should read: "That the defendants do "pay to the plaintiffs their costs of the said motion in any event," and then there will not have to be the wasteful, and I daresay futile, procedure of a separate taxation. But save for those two variations, which are really matters of form and not of substance, I think that no good ground is shown why we should interfere with the steps which the judge thought it right to take to protect the proper interests of the plaintiffs, and I would, accordingly, dismiss the appeal.

ROMER L.J. I agree and have only a very few words to add.

The principal submissions on which the defendants rely are, first, that no amount of user of premises for the purposes of prostitution can in itself constitute a private nuisance actionable at the instance of the occupiers of neighbouring houses. As to that I am quite satisfied that the proposition so presented is a great deal too wide; and for the reasons which Lord Evershed M.R. has given I think that the contrary could now hardly be suggested. It is, however, a question of fact in each particular case whether a nuisance has or has not been established.

The second point on which the defendants rely is that nothing can constitute a private nuisance at law unless it affects the reasonable enjoyment of other premises in a physical way. This is only an interlocutory application, and at the trial no doubt that point will be taken again and may be argued at greater length, but my present impression is that it is unsound. It appears to be an unwarrantable gloss on the law on the subject as formulated in the textbooks and, what is perhaps more important, it appears to be inconsistent with the judgments of this court in Lyons & Sons v. Wilkins,[3] which was the picketing case. Consequently I am not prepared to accept either of the principal submissions on which the defendants are founding their case on this appeal.

The question then whether the plaintiffs have made out a case for the interference of this court by injunction is, as I have indicated, one of fact; and although the affidavit evidence which the plaintiffs have put in is not of a very elaborate description (and will no doubt receive further attention and be given in more detail at the trial) there is, I think, ample to lead to the conclusion that what these defendants have been doing in this house constitutes an actionable interference with the plaintiffs in the reasonable and ordinary enjoyment of their houses. Lord Evershed M.R. has said, one of the plaintiffs at all events—indeed I think both of them—have young sons living there and their wives, and one of them has three young servants. One can well imagine the effect of what is going on in the house, almost next door in one case and exactly next door in the other is likely to have on the minds of those young people. One can imagine also the feelings of visitors who come to the houses, or are invited to the houses, and all sorts of other considerations inevitably arise from the user to which the defendants have openly been putting the house to which they have resorted. I have no doubt that Wynn-Parry J. was quite right—taking the evidence in a broad sense—in giving the relief for which the plaintiffs asked, although I agree with Lord Evershed M.R. that the actual form of the order went too far, and should be modified in the manner which he has suggested. Subject to that, I would dismiss the appeal.

PARKER L.J. I entirely agree with what my Lords have said.

Appeal dismissed.

Road Traffic—Disqualification—Power to vary—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (20 & 21 Geo. 5, c. 43), ss. 6, 7 (3).

Per curiam. On an application under section 7 (3) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, the court has no power to vary a disqualification for holding a licence by limiting the class of vehicle to which it applies, but may only remove the disqualification or refuse the application.

Regina v. Cottrell, ante, p. 70; [1955] 3 All E.R. 817 approved.

APPLICATION for extension of time for leave to appeal against sentence.

On July 12, 1954, the applicant, Haydn Cottrell, pleaded Guilty at Swansea Assizes to a charge of dangerous driving arising out of an incident which occurred when he was driving a motor-lorry and which involved the death of a bystander. Glyn-Jones J. imposed a fine of £50 and said: "In addition, you will be dis-"qualified from driving all motor-vehicles for a period of five "years, but I do not want necessarily to bring it about that you "never drive even your motor-bicycle during the whole of that "period, and I will say this, that you have your right to apply, "on the proper grounds, for the removal of that disqualification "after an appropriate interval and I will express the opinion "that, if at the end of one year from now the court is satisfied " with your behaviour and performance, I should not think it out " of keeping with the spirit of my sentence that you should then " have the disqualification varied so as to permit you to ride your " motor-bicycle."

On November 16, 1955, the applicant applied to McNair J., at Cardiff Assizes, under section 7 (3) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930,† for variation of the disqualification. McNair J.‡ held that under section 7 (3) of the Act of 1930 the court had no power to vary a disqualification, but could only remove it or refuse the application and that, although the facts would justify the exercise of a discretion to vary the disqualification in the manner sought, they did not justify its removal, and, accordingly, he refused the application.

The applicant now applied for extension of time for leave to appeal against sentence.

The applicant did not appear and was not represented.

LORD GODDARD C.J. This application comes before the court in very unusual circumstances. The applicant was convicted before Glyn-Jones J. at the Summer Assizes for Glamorganshire in July, 1954, of the dangerous driving of a motor-lorry. The judge fined him £50 and disqualified him from driving all motor-vehicles for a period of five years; but he then went on to say that if he applied after the expiration of 12 months to have the disqualification removed so far as it related to motor-cycles he thought that it would be a proper case in which indulgence could be shown to him. The applicant did apply after 16 months to have the disqualification altered to permit him to ride a motor-cycle so that he could go to and from work. McNair J.[1] held, as this court thinks, quite rightly, that he had no power to make the order. The applicant is now seeking leave to appeal, not against the refusal of McNair J. to vary the disqualification, but

† Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 6: " Any court before which a person " is convicted of any criminal offence " in connection with the driving of a " motor-vehicle (not being an offence " under Part IV of this Act)—(a) may " . . . order him to be disqualified " for holding or obtaining a licence " for such period as the court thinks " fit. . . . Provided that, if the court " thinks fit, any disqualification im- " posed under this section may be " limited to the driving of a motor- " vehicle of the same class or descrip- " tion as the vehicle in relation to " which the offence was committed."

S. 7 (3): " A person who by virtue " of a conviction or order under this " part of this Act is disqualified for " holding or obtaining a licence, may, " at any time after the expiration of " six months from the date of the " conviction or order, and from time " to time apply to the court before " which he was convicted or by which " the order was made to remove the " disqualification, and on any such " application the court may, as it " thinks proper, having regard to the " character of the person disqualified " and his conduct subsequent to the " conviction or order, the nature of " the offence, and any other circum- " stances of the case, either by order " remove the disqualification as from " such date as may be specified in " the order or refuse the application."

against the original sentence, and of course that will involve our extending the time because the conviction was 18 months ago.

[His Lordship referred to section 6 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, and continued:] Where a person is convicted of an offence which either carries or enables the court to impose disqualification, the court can do one of three things under section 6: they may, except in cases where the disqualification is directed, refuse to disqualify; secondly, they may disqualify a person entirely from getting a licence to drive; or, thirdly, they can say: "We "disqualify you from driving the particular class of vehicle which "you were driving at the time of the accident."

[His Lordship read section 7 (3) and continued:] The applicant applied to McNair J. under that subsection, and that judge held that, although the subsection enabled him to remove the disqualification, it did not enable him to vary it, so the applicant found that the disqualification imposed by Glyn-Jones J. still stood. I think that this is a point to which the Minister's attention might be drawn, as there is a Road Traffic Bill before Parliament at the present time, and it might be a useful thing to provide that a court may not only remove a disqualification, but may also vary it.

The first thing we have to decide is whether we should give leave to appeal against the original sentence imposed by Glyn-Jones J. in 1954. Glyn-Jones J. obviously meant that he did not wish the disqualification with regard to a motor-cycle to remain in force for all the five years for which he disqualified the applicant from holding a licence; and the judge no doubt thought, per incuriam, that under section 7 the applicant would be able to go to the court, as he said, in a year, to get the disqualification varied, but unfortunately the judge was in error in that. Knowing that this case was coming on, the judge saw me and explained that if he had realized what the consequences would have been he thinks it probable that he would have done what he undoubtedly had power to do, and that was to have limited the disqualification to the driving of lorries. The position is that the applicant has been led to believe by what the judge said at the trial that after an interval of not less than a year he would be able to get permission to drive a motor-cycle. It would be hard on the applicant if, by reason of an error into which the judge fell at the moment, and into which we are all liable to fall from time to time, for it is impossible to bear in mind all the various provisions of the Road Traffic Act with regard to disqualification, a more serious punishment was put upon him than was intended by the judge; and the court cannot help taking notice of the fact that he has been disqualified from driving his motor-cycle for more than a year now. The court has come to the conclusion that the right thing to do is to grant an extension of time in which to appeal. We do not think that it is necessary to call on the prosecution because there is no law in the case. It is a strong thing to do after all this time, but we think that in the particular circumstances the applicant has been misled by an error of the judge, and that he ought to have an extension of time in which to appeal. We give him leave to appeal against his sentence and we treat this application as the hearing of the appeal. We have decided to alter the sentence which was passed by Glyn-Jones J. by leaving the disqualification as it stands for five years, but limiting it under the proviso to section 6 to the driving of motor-lorries, and that will enable him now to ride a motor-cycle.

Application allowed. Sentence varied.

* CLARK v. CLARK (BY HER GUARDIAN).

Husband and Wife — Desertion — Mental patient, by — Respondent a voluntary patient — Respondent capable of forming intention to desert—Respondent's wish to remain in hospital—No proper home available—Just cause for remaining apart.

A wife was admitted as a voluntary patient to a mental hospital with the husband's approval in June, 1943, where she remained. In October, 1943, the husband ceased to visit her after she had failed to recognize him, and never visited her thereafter nor went to the hospital to make personal inquiries about her. In May, 1952, after visiting a Citizen's Advice Bureau, he communicated with the hospital, and although stating in a letter to the medical superintendent that he would try to save money for a home, and to visit his wife in his holidays, never in fact did so. He was informed soon afterwards that his wife would hardly be fit to leave hospital even if she wished, which was not the case. The husband, who had committed adultery with one woman in 1946, began to commit adultery with another shortly after he had received this information. In July, 1954, he presented a petition for divorce on the ground of desertion.

Evidence from the hospital established that the wife at material times had a mind which was capable of forming an intention to desert, that she did not wish to return to her husband, and that if she had sought the advice of the medical superintendent he would not have advised her to go out from the mental hospital unless he felt satisfied that she was going to a home where she could be properly looked after:—

Held, (1) that the original separation had been by consent.

(2) That the husband had not established on the evidence that a fixed intention by the wife not to live with her husband existed three years prior to the presentation of his petition.

(3) Further, that the fact that there was no proper home for the wife to go to if she wished to leave hospital amounted to a just cause for her not returning to her husband.

Keeley v. Keeley [1952] 2 T.L.R. 756 distinguished.

Clark v. Clark.

Defended petition for divorce by husband on the ground of desertion.

The parties were married in August, 1939, according to the rites of the Roman Catholic Church, the wife being a Catholic but the husband a Protestant. The husband was then serving in the Army, and within a very short time of the marriage war broke out. The parties never really had a matrimonial home. They lived occasionally, when the husband had a leave, with the wife's parents, who had a home near Liverpool; and occasionally she went to wherever he happened to be stationed.

The wife had a number of miscarriages. A child was born to her in October, 1942; but the child only lived for about seven months, and the loss of the child had a very grave effect on the wife's mind. The husband in his evidence said that she completely went to pieces, and after being for a time in a general hospital for observation, she was admitted as a voluntary patient to Rainhill Mental Hospital, Liverpool, on June 11, 1943, where she was still a patient at the date of these proceedings. Up till that time the marriage had been a normally happy one.

The husband consented to her going to the mental hospital, and, indeed, it was he who persuaded her to go there. He visited her from time to time up to October, 1943, but did not visit her thereafter. On the last occasion that he visited her she was unable to recognize him.

In June, 1944, the husband was posted overseas to Europe, and served there (with the exception of one or two leaves) until December, 1945, when he returned to England. He was released from the Army on February 19, 1946, and returned to Liverpool, where the parties had been when the wife was admitted to the mental hospital. He remained in Liverpool until June, 1948: during that time, although he stated in his evidence that he telephoned the hospital on occasions, he never once visited his wife, nor went to the hospital to make personal inquiries about her. In June, 1948, he went to London. He was not a skilled man in any sense of the word and he did different labouring jobs in Liverpool and later in London.

In May, 1952, he consulted a Citizen's Advice Bureau in regard to his marriage in circumstances set out in the judgment: it appeared that he was not sure where the wife then was. After writing to the hospital he received a letter from the mental hospital stating that the wife was "solitary and self-absorbed, "understanding what is said to her but never conversing. "She is tidy in her habits and occupies herself usefully. She "is in good physical health." But it was pointed out to the husband that he would be unable to obtain a decree of divorce on the ground of insanity as she was not a certified patient and there had been no order justifying her detention, although the letter added "There might be a possibility [of divorce] if you could "prove that she deserted you." Although the husband in his reply said that he would try to plan a return to her, would save money for a home, and would try to visit Liverpool on his holidays, he never in fact made any attempt to see his wife and there was no evidence that the wife ever knew of the husband having any home in London or anywhere else where he was ready to receive her. The medical superintendent informed the husband that the wife was "still suffering from a mental illness and "would hardly be fit to leave hospital even if she wished, which "is not the case"; and he reported on August 1, 1952, that the wife "is quite definite in her answers to the questions which I "repeated several times. She states that she wishes to stay in "hospital and that she does not want to go to her husband, and "has not wanted to go to him in the past."

The medical inspector had personally examined the wife on December 4, 1951, and reported "Although mute I found her "accessible. She nodded when asked repeatedly whether she "wished to remain here and said 'no' when asked if she wished "to go home. Although confused she retains her volition and, as "I saw her today, she is fit to remain as a voluntary patient."

The court found upon the medical evidence that the wife had a mind which was capable of forming an intention to desert. The effect of the medical evidence was that if the wife had sought the advice of the medical superintendent he would not have advised her to go out from the mental hospital unless he felt satisfied that she was going to a home where she could be properly looked after.

On July 28, 1954, the husband presented a petition for divorce on the ground of desertion; and asked for the discretion of the court in respect of adultery with one woman in 1946, and with another woman, whom he had met in January, 1951, shortly after the correspondence of 1952.

David Weitzman Q.C. and John Hazan for the husband.

Stuart Horner for the Official Solicitor as guardian ad litem for the wife.

Keeley v. Keeley [1] was cited in argument.

BARNARD J. outlined the history of the parties up to the husband's arrival in London in 1948 and continued: The facts of this case (I shall have to deal in a little more detail presently with some of the husband's evidence, more particularly in regard to letters he wrote) are fairly simple, but I admit that I find it difficult to apply the law to them.

In May, 1952, which is some four years after he had been in London, the husband consulted a Citizen's Advice Bureau. I think it is perfectly clear from their letter to him that he had really put his wife out of his mind and was not worrying about her at all. In fact, even when he was in Liverpool in 1946, when

CLARK v. CLARK.

he had come out of the Army, he never went to see her, and if one looks at his discretion statement you will find that during that year he was having an affair with some other woman, and obviously was not bothering about his wife. It is perfectly plain that he was not even certain that his wife was still in the hospital, because the Citizen's Advice Bureau wrote saying: "Is "Mrs. Clark still a patient in your hospital?" and then asked for any other information they had. It is also quite clear that the husband told the Citizen's Advice Bureau he was not quite sure where she was. When he last heard of her she was in this hospital, and when he found that she was still in the same hospital and the hospital authorities were not wishing to give any information about the patient except to the husband himself, you find him writing a letter on May 29, 1952, in which he says: "My reason being that I am about to make a start at sorting "out the mess I have made of this last ten years. Your informa- "tion will give me a good lead in a really determined start. "Another woman and child is involved who befriended me when "I was really down and unable to work, and during the times "when I was in hospital she supplied my needs. With her I "found a happiness which I had never enjoyed before although "I had never lived with her." We now know from his discretion statement that this was yet another woman whom he said he had met early in the year 1952; but on his own evidence it is clear that he had met her in January, 1951.

The husband would not agree that he wrote this letter with divorce in his mind. His explanation was that through this other woman he realized for the first time what companionship was, and it was that which made him want his wife all the more. I find myself quite unable to accept that explanation. You only have to read on in the letter: "However, I shall await your "reply before putting my case before a solicitor." Whatever case could he have to put before a solicitor if all he really wanted was to have his wife back? I do not think that the husband was being at all frank with me about this letter, and it is quite obvious to my mind that having met this other woman he was really thinking about matrimony again and getting rid of his wife; hence his inquiries as to whether she was still in the hospital, and hence his remarks about putting his case before a solicitor.

The reply he got made it quite clear what his wife's condition was, namely, that she was "solitary and self-absorbed, under- "standing what is said to her but never conversing. She is tidy "in habits and occupies herself usefully. She is in good physical "health." But the reply went on to say: "You would not, I "am afraid, be able to obtain a divorce since she has not been "here as a certified patient, no order justifying her detention," and further, "Well, there might be a possibility if you could "prove that she deserted you." It may be that when he received that letter his first thought was, "I had better make the best of " a bad job and give up the idea of divorce, even give up this " other woman and try and get my wife back," because he writes the very next day, " I acknowledge my responsibility and " so my first has first claim. The information you gave has " given me some hope, so casting everything aside for the time " being I shall try and plan a return to her. As I am only an " ordinary working man having no capital or other means I shall " need a period of time to get money saved. When I think that " I have enough to start a home then I shall return to Liverpool " and hope for the best. I think I shall need about six months " at the most. It is my intention now to try and make up to " her as much as I can as fast as I can," and he finished the letter by saying, " When my holidays come I shall endeavour to " come up for a personal interview with you and also to see my " wife." Now his holidays did come, but he never went to Liverpool, he never saw the medical superintendent, and he never made any attempt to see his wife.

It is only fair to the husband to say that the letter he got back from the medical superintendent may have damped his enthusiasm for having his wife back, because the medical superintendent wrote and said, " She is still suffering from a mental " illness and would hardly be fit to leave hospital even if she " wished, which is not the case." The medical superintendent had, on December 4, 1951, personally examined the wife. That was because some other consultant thought she ought to be certified and the medical superintendent reported, " Although " mute I found her accessible. She nodded when asked " repeatedly whether she wished to remain here and said ' No ' " when asked if she wished to go home. Although confused she " retains her volition and, as I saw her today, she is fit to remain " as a voluntary patient." She said " No " when asked if she wished to go home; but what puzzles me is what home was there for her to go back to? They never had a home. There is no evidence before me that she knew of the husband having any home in London or anywhere else where he was ready to receive her.

It is a little significant that while these letters were being written, first of all the letter in which the husband quite clearly, I think, wanted to see whether he could divorce his wife because he was carrying on with another girl, then his second letter, when it looked as if a divorce was out of the question, in which there was some expression of intention, at any rate, to live with his wife, and then when he heard even that was going to be a little difficult because of her health, within a very short time on his own admission he had committed adultery with this girl with whom he had been having an affair. Then, of course, there came a complete change of front again in which obviously the husband was out once more to get a divorce, because a series of interrogatories were delivered to the medical superintendent to answer, which were written by the husband but obviously prepared for him by someone having legal knowledge.

I have heard the evidence of Dr. Finkleman, who has been at Rainhill Hospital ever since August, 1946, and who has been the medical superintendent there since January, 1950. There is no doubt that this woman had enough mind to say whether she wanted to remain in the home or whether she wanted to return to her husband, so she certainly had a mind which was capable of forming an intention to desert. But the first legal problem that I am faced with is this: it is clear on the evidence that when the wife went into this mental hospital as a voluntary patient the husband consented to her going, in fact it was he who persuaded her to go, maybe for her own good, maybe, as was suggested, that he had got a compassionate posting to Liverpool and preferred being there to being up in the Orkneys where he had come from. But I say nothing about that, the motive does not matter. He consented to her going into this hospital, and therefore their separation from then on was a separation by consent.

Now has anything happened since then to alter the character of that separation and turn it into one of desertion? Quite unlike Keeley v. Keeley,[1] to which I was referred, in this case after October, 1943, the husband never went near his wife, and never even wrote to her. If you look at the facts in Keeley v. Keeley [1]; during a period of two years the husband had visited the wife in the mental hospital and had tried to persuade her to return home, to a home which he had. The evidence in Keeley v. Keeley [1] showed that the wife seemed quite normal to the husband when he visited her and it was clear that he wanted her home, but she said that she preferred to stay where she was. I have got no such evidence in this case. The only evidence I have got is that at some stage or other she expressed an intention not to live with her husband. The first record I find of that is when the medical superintendent saw her on August 1, 1952, and that was obviously as a result of a letter he had from solicitors appearing on behalf of the husband. On August 1, 1952, the medical superintendent reported, " She is quite definite in her answers to " the questions which I repeated several times. She states that " she wishes to stay in hospital and that she does not want to " go to her husband, and has not wanted to go to him in the " past."

This petition was presented on July 28, 1954, and so at any rate I have got to be satisfied that she had a fixed intention never to live with her husband again prior to July 28, 1951. That is the only evidence I have got, and in August, 1952, when she was asked, that is what she said.

But the medical superintendent did write to the husband's solicitors, "In any case I could without doubt establish a three-year period from December, 1951, or August, 1952, to date." The only reason he mentions December, 1951—and there was not any reference to the husband—is that he asked her whether she wanted to go home, and she said, "No." What that answer meant exactly I do not know, for there was no home. I do not feel that on those facts the husband has established a charge of desertion for three years immediately prior to the presentation of this petition.

But I do not think that the matter quite rests there either. There is this question of just cause. On the facts of this case (which are, as I have stated, very different from Keeley v. Keeley [1]) I have come to the conclusion that there was just cause. I do not want to recapitulate what I have already said about the husband never going near his wife since October, 1943, and never writing to her. The only information which he got in the first instance from the medical superintendent was when he was wanting to get a divorce, not to live with his wife. One must also bear in mind the medical superintendent's evidence, which I think amounted to this, that if the wife sought his advice he would not have advised her to go out from the mental home unless he felt satisfied that she was going to a home where she could be properly looked after. In this particular case although the husband in a letter said that he was going to save money and get her a home, he did not do anything of the sort. It may not have been his fault. As far as I know there never was a home to offer this woman, and even if there had been a home she was the wife of an ordinary working man and there is no evidence that the husband had found anyone who was prepared to give him a home and look after his wife when he was out. The medical superintendent made it perfectly clear that she was not fit to run a home and look after her husband, and therefore on the facts of this case I should be prepared to also say that there was just cause, which would also defeat the charge of desertion. For these reasons, and it may be regrettable, I consider that it is my duty to dismiss this petition.

Petition dismissed.

Lord Evershed M.R., Jenkins and Birkett L.JJ.

*FIRESTONE TYRE AND RUBBER CO. LTD. v. LEWELLIN (INSPECTOR OF TAXES).

Revenue—Income tax—Non-resident—Trade within United Kingdom—Contracts made in United Kingdom for sale of goods manufactured there—United Kingdom assessed as agent of foreign company—Whether authorized regular agent of foreign company carrying on trade or business within the United Kingdom—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 & 9 Geo. 5, c. 40), Sched. D, para. 1 (a) (iii)—All Schedules Rules, rr. 5, 10.

A company registered in the United Kingdom was assessed to income tax on the profits of its business of branded tyre manufacturers within the United Kingdom. In addition it was assessed on the profits of the trade of marketing the branded tyres carried on with customers on the continent of Europe. This additional assessment was made on the footing that the company was itself carrying on that trade or, alternatively, that a foreign non-resident company of the same name, which owned all the shares in the United Kingdom company, was (a) itself carrying on the trade within the United Kingdom of selling the tyres outside the United Kingdom, or (b) was carrying on that trade through the agency of the United Kingdom company.

The foreign company had made agreements relating to the sale of its branded products with distributors on the continent of Europe, giving them lists of the suppliers from whom they might order the goods. The United Kingdom company was an authorized supplier. By agreement between the foreign company and the United Kingdom company, the latter was authorized to fulfil orders received from distributors. A subsequent agreement made between the foreign company and the United Kingdom company ostensibly altered this, the United Kingdom company agreeing to fulfil all orders obtained by the foreign company in Europe or elsewhere as and when requested by the foreign company, to forward the goods ordered to the purchaser and to give such instructions as to payment as were requested by the foreign company. In practice, however, the United Kingdom company continued to fulfil orders received direct from the authorized distributors, normally without further intervention by the foreign company. Delivery of the goods was f.a.s. and payment was in each case effected in the United Kingdom. The United Kingdom company retained out of the payments received the cost price plus 5 per cent. and remitted the balance to the foreign company (or when that became impossible owing to war-time currency restrictions, it credited the sums held on behalf of the foreign company to a separate account in its books). The foreign company was supplied with details of each order effected:—

Held, that on the acceptance by the United Kingdom company of each order received from a distributor there came into existence a contract of sale made in the United Kingdom between the United Kingdom company and the distributor. Each such contract was an incident, deliberately contrived, of the business of the foreign company of marketing and distributing the branded products in the United Kingdom and elsewhere by means of the United Kingdom company. That company was a separate legal entity and not a mere emanation of the foreign company; it was, however, wholly controlled by the foreign company and the substance of the relationship was that the trade of the foreign company was carried on by the United Kingdom company on behalf of and for the foreign company, or, in other words, as the authorized regular agent of that company. Accordingly, (1) the foreign company was carrying on a trade within the United Kingdom in respect of which tax was chargeable under Schedule D, para. 1 (a) (iii) to the Income Tax Act, 1918; and (2) the United Kingdom company was its regular agent in whose name it was properly assessed to tax on profits of that trade under rules 5 and 10 of the All Schedules Rules.

Decision of Harman J. affirmed.

APPEAL from Harman J.

At a meeting of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts held on May 27 and 28, 1952, the Firestone Tyre and Rubber Co. Ltd. (hereinafter called "Brentford") which carried on the business of tyre and rubber manufacturers at Great West Road, Brentford, Middlesex, appealed against two alternative series of income tax assessments made on it for the years 1940–1941 to 1944–1945 inclusive. The first series of assessments made on Brentford under Case I of Schedule D in respect of profits as tyre manufacturers was for £5,000 for each of the material five years, except the year 1944–1945, for which the assessment was £10,000. The second series was made on Brentford as agents for an American corporation, the Firestone Tire and Rubber Co. of Akron, Ohio, in the United States of America (hereinafter called "Akron"), in respect of agency profits. In that series for each of the years in question the assessment was £10,000

These assessments were in addition to the assessments made on Brentford in respect of its own business of tyre manufacturers.

The following facts were set out in the case stated as having been proved or admitted before the commissioners: Paragraph 4: Akron, an American corporation registered in Akron, Ohio, was the head of a world-wide organization consisting of a large group of corporations operating in America and in various parts of the world. Some of its associated and subsidiary corporations manufactured and sold tyres in the countries in which they were registered, and others sold, in the countries in which they were registered, tyres which had been manufactured in America or by subsidiary corporations in other countries. For convenience, certain matters in regard to the business of the organization carried on outside the United States of America had been conducted by other subsidiary companies of Akron but for the purposes of the . . . appeal . . . it was agreed . . . Akron and any of its associated and subsidiary companies registered outside the United Kingdom should be treated as one person. . . .

Brentford was an English company registered in 1922 with an issued capital of £20,000 in £1 ordinary shares. This capital was increased to £140,000 in 1938. All the shares in Brentford were owned by Akron. The board of directors of Brentford consisted of individuals resident in the United Kingdom with the exception of Mr. Harvey Firestone, the chairman of the board of directors of Akron, who was a director of Brentford and occasionally attended meetings of its directors.

Following its incorporation, Brentford's business consisted in the selling of Firestone tyres in the United Kingdom which had been manufactured in America. In 1928, a factory for the manufacture of tyres was built at Brentford, and from 1929 onwards, Brentford's business consisted by agreement with Akron of the manufacture and sale of tyres under the name of Firestone tyres in the United Kingdom. Brentford had been throughout duly assessed to income tax under Case I, Schedule D, in respect of this business. The trade mark in these tyres was owned by Akron and Brentford was, therefore, unable to sell them inside or outside the United Kingdom without the consent of Akron.

5. Firestone tyres which had been manufactured by Brentford were exported to customers outside the United Kingdom by agreement with Akron in accordance with the following arrangements. They were exported only to persons approved by Akron as " distributors " of Firestone tyres, who were required to sign an agreement with Akron. A copy of a specimen of that agreement, dated May 20, 1935, and made between a Swedish corporation and Akron, formed part of the case. The material clauses are set out in the judgment of Lord Evershed M.R., their effect being summarized in the stated case as follows: Under this agreement Akron granted to the Swedish distributor the exclusive right to sell Firestone tyres and accessories in Sweden, and the latter undertook to buy, sell and distribute such Firestone branded products exclusively; to keep on hand reasonable stocks of these products; and to use its best efforts to sell these products in Sweden but not elsewhere. The distributor was entitled to buy Firestone products at prices set out in lists attached to the agreement subject to Akron's right to change the prices without notice. Akron undertook to make deliveries f.a.s. vessel and it was agreed that delivery to a carrier should constitute delivery to the distributor. The terms of Akron were 90 days sight draft documents against acceptance. Akron agreed that in the event of its reducing its billing prices it would credit the difference between the old and the new prices, not only on goods in transit to but also on stocks held by the distributor. The distributor agreed that in the event of Akron increasing prices, the former would accept a debit for the difference in prices not only on goods in transit but also on stocks held by it. It was understood and agreed between the parties to the agreement that it was not to be construed as constituting the distributor as an agent of Akron for any purpose whatever. The contract between the parties set out in the agreement was to become effective only when executed by the duly authorized representative of Akron at Akron in Ohio, it being agreed that the agreement was to be construed under the laws of the state of Ohio in the United States of America. It was also agreed that the terms of the agreement could not be altered, waived or modified, except by written endorsement thereon executed on behalf of Akron at Akron in Ohio. At the hearing before the commissioners it was agreed between the parties to the appeal that that document could be taken as typical of the agreements entered into between Akron and its distributors outside the United Kingdom (hereinafter referred to as " master " agreements ").

6. The foreign distributors who had entered into a master agreement with Akron were given lists of the corporations which manufactured Firestone products and were empowered to order these products in accordance with the terms of the master agreement from whichever manufacturing corporation they preferred. Brentford was included in the lists of corporations furnished by Akron to its distributors outside the United Kingdom. Brentford was authorized by Akron to supply Firestone products outside the United Kingdom to distributors who had signed a master agreement with Akron and was supplied by the latter with lists of such distributors. Brentford did not seek orders from the distributors of Akron or employ travellers outside the United Kingdom, but fulfilled by manufacture or from its existing stocks orders made upon it by the distributors in accordance with the terms and conditions laid down by Akron in the master agreements.

7. Following negotiations between the two corporations an agreement was drawn up on February 8, 1936, regulating the fulfilment by Brentford on behalf of Akron of orders obtained in Europe and elsewhere by Akron. . . .

The material clauses of that agreement are set out in the judgment of Lord Evershed M.R., their effect being summarized in paragraph 8 of the case stated as follows: By that agreement Brentford undertook to use its best endeavours to fulfil either by manufacture or from its existing stock all orders obtained by Akron in Europe or elsewhere as and when requested to do so by Akron. Brentford also agreed upon receipt of an order to forward the goods ordered to the purchaser, and to give such instructions for payment of the purchase price as should be requested by Akron. (In practice, however, Brentford continued to fulfil orders received direct from the distributors, provided they appeared on the lists of authorized distributors supplied by Akron to Brentford as above mentioned, without, normally, any further intervention by Akron.) Akron, in consideration of these services, undertook to pay to Brentford a sum equal to the total cost price (as therein defined) of the goods supplied plus 5 per cent. thereof. The agreement was to continue for a period of five years, and thereafter until determined by either party. It had never been determined.

9. Until the outbreak of war in 1939, Brentford continued to supply goods to authorized distributors of Akron as ordered by them; to collect the moneys for these goods and to pay these into Akron's bank account in London. Transfers from this account to the United States of America were regularly made.

FIRESTONE TYRE AND RUBBER CO. LTD. v. LEWELLIN (INSPECTOR OF TAXES).

Following the outbreak of the war money could not be remitted from the United Kingdom to the United States of America. Up to November 30, 1939, all the moneys collected by Brentford from Akron's distributors were paid into a separate bank account, and on that date the balance in this account was transferred to Brentford's own bank account. In its own books Brentford credited Akron with the amount so transferred.

From December 1, 1939, onwards, it was agreed between Akron and Brentford that the proceeds of sales to Akron's distributors should be placed to the credit of a new banking account marked "Firestone Tyre & Rubber Co. Ltd. Export Proceeds "Account." At the end of each month the balance of that account was transferred to Brentford's own current account. The sums so transferred were, pursuant to the agreement, treated in Brentford's books as sums lent to or deposited with it by Akron.

10. From September, 1939, to April, 1942, the export of tyres from the United Kingdom was prohibited except by licence of the Board of Trade. Orders from Akron's distributors abroad could therefore be fulfilled by Brentford only if it was able to obtain a licence from the Board of Trade.

11. In April, 1942, the Ministry of Supply set up a tyre control section. By virtue of S.R. & O., No. 596 of 1942, it was provided that with certain exceptions no person other than an authorized tyre depot should acquire or dispose of or agree or offer to acquire or dispose of any tyre. The statutory order gave power to deal in tyres under the authority of and in accordance with a licence granted, or a special or general direction issued by the Ministry of Supply. The effect of this statutory order was to cancel all existing export licences and, until normal export shipments were resumed for passenger car tyres in 1947 and for larger tyres in 1948, all exports were made in accordance with allocations made by the tyre control, and all goods which were sent abroad by Brentford were sent under and by the authority of a licence issued by the tyre control section of the Ministry of Supply. The tyres so exported by Brentford were sent either in response to an order originating with an Akron distributor and authorized by tyre control, or else in pursuance of a direction by the Ministry of Supply to send tyres to a certain country. In the latter event, the tyres were sent to the appropriate Akron distributor in the country, if there was one. The only exception to this practice was that sales of tyres amounting to some £12,000 and £37,000 respectively were made to the Government of New Zealand and to the Free French Delegation in London. These tyres were exported by the purchasers themselves.

The total sales abroad in the period with which the case was concerned was £782,000. Apart from the two items referred to above, amounting to £49,000, the whole of these sales were made to distributors of Akron. They were treated by Brentford as the fulfilment of orders obtained by Akron in accordance with the agreement of February 8, 1936, and the proceeds thereof less the cost of the goods plus 5 per cent. of that cost were credited to Akron in the books of Brentford. The amounts retained by Brentford, namely, the cost of the goods plus 5 per cent. of that cost, had already been brought into account in the assessments made upon it in respect of its own business.

12. Throughout the period concerned in the case, sales were invoiced to the appropriate distributor in the name of Brentford, and a sight bill of exchange on the distributor for payment in London was drawn in the name of Brentford. Brentford arranged for the shipment to the distributors of the tyres, etc., ordered by them from Brentford. In respect of each transaction Brentford furnished to Akron copies of the export invoice, the export manifest, the sight draft and the bill of lading. Akron was also notified by the bank when Brentford received payment for the goods. These documents and this information was sent for the purpose of enabling Akron to prepare its own sales ledgers. No sales ledgers for accounts of distributors outside the United Kingdom were kept by Brentford.

In the case of the relatively small sales to the New Zealand Government and the Free French Government, although the sales were made to agents in this country, Brentford regarded them as sales to persons outside the United Kingdom and as, therefore, coming within the scope of the agreement of February 8, 1936. The proceeds of these sales, less the factory cost plus 5 per cent. thereof, were, in the books of Brentford, credited to Akron and not to the sales account of Brentford itself.

After the cessation of tyre control Akron and Brentford reverted to their pre-war practice, the only difference being that the proceeds of all sales to foreign distributors had to remain in London and could not be remitted to Akron in America.

The material part of the decision of the commissioners was stated as follows in paragraph 16 of the stated case: "(c) It "seems to us that in the relevant years the arrangements sub- "sisting between Akron and Brentford were as follows: By "virtue of the agreement of February 8, 1936, Brentford agreed "to fulfil orders obtained by Akron when requested to do so by "Akron. The orders to be fulfilled were limited to those from "customers approved by Akron and these orders were to be "fulfilled on terms laid down by Akron in master agreements "executed outside the United Kingdom. Brentford was "authorized by Akron to fulfil orders coming from Akron's "approved customers without any intervention by Akron and "all the documents for the fulfilment of the order were made "out in the name of Brentford. Moreover, the proceeds of the "sales arising from the fulfilment of the orders were paid to "Brentford in the United Kingdom. These sales moneys were "paid into a special bank account and transferred to Brentford's "bank account at the end of each month.

"(d) We are unable to accept the proposition put forward on "behalf of Brentford that the fulfilment of each order by Brent- "ford involved a sale of goods to Akron with delivery to the "latter's orders. It seems to us that the effect of the agreement "of February 8, 1936, and the course of the dealings between "Akron and Brentford was to set up standing arrangements "whereby Brentford agreed to hold goods of its own at the "disposal of Akron and to sell the same on Akron's behalf to "customers approved of by Akron and subject to terms imposed "by Akron; and, further, to account to Akron for the proceeds "of the sales less the cost of the goods sold plus 5 per cent.

"(e) We further think that when Brentford received the "moneys payable for the goods sold to Akron's customers it was "collecting the price of the goods as such and that it later was "able to appropriate these proceeds for its own purposes as "loans from Akron. . . . In the present case, although the "'master agreements' by virtue of which the individual orders "for goods were placed were executed outside the United "Kingdom, the orders themselves were received and fulfilled in "England and payment of the price of the goods was received "in England. In all the circumstances we come to the con- "clusion that in the relevant years Akron was exercising a trade "in the United Kingdom through the agency of Brentford."

Firestone Tyre and Rubber Co. Ltd. (Brentford) appealed. Harman J. held that the business of Akron was being carried on within the United Kingdom by Brentford, who was acting as the regular agent for Akron and was properly assessed as such.

LORD EVERSHED M.R. It may be truly said as a general proposition that the bulk of those who are liable to pay income tax are the subjects of Her Majesty resident in the United Kingdom. But there are some few cases in which persons not subjects of Her Majesty, and not indeed resident in the United Kingdom, may pay the tax. Thus, to refer to the Income Tax Act which is appropriate to this case, the Income Tax Act, 1918, Schedule D, paragraph 1, of that Act provides: "Tax under "this Schedule shall be charged in respect of—(a) The annual "profits or gains arising or accruing— . . . (iii) to any person, "whether a British subject or not, although not resident in the "United Kingdom . . . from any trade, profession, employment, "or vocation exercised within the United Kingdom."

That tax liability of foreign non-residents is qualified and governed as regards assessment by certain of the General Rules —and again I refer only to those material to the present case— applicable to Schedules A, B, C. D and E. Of those rules it will be sufficient to read rules 5 and 10, which have assumed their present form as successors in title (as it were) of the original Income Tax Act, 1842, as amended by the Act of 1915. Rule 5 states: "A person not resident in the United Kingdom, "whether a British subject or not, shall be assessable and charge- "able in the name of any such trustee, guardian, tutor, curator, "or committee, or . . . "—and these are the more important words—". . . of any factor, agent, receiver, branch, or manager, "whether such factor, agent, receiver, branch, or manager has "the receipt of the profits or gains or not, in like manner and "to the like amount as such non-resident person would be "assessed and charged if he were resident in the United King- "dom and in the actual receipt of such profits or gains." But rule 10 provides: "Nothing in these rules shall render a non- "resident person chargeable in the name of a broker or general "commission agent, or in the name of an agent not being an "authorized person carrying on the regular agency of the non- "resident person or a person chargeable as if he were an agent "in pursuance of these rules, in respect of profits or gains arising "from sales or transactions carried out through such a broker "or agent."

From the paragraphs in Schedule D which I have read, and the two rules, it follows that in the case of an attempt to tax, via a "regular" agent, a non-resident person, two requirements must be shown to be satisfied—first, the non-resident must be not merely trading with the United Kingdom but exercising, that is carrying on, a trade or profession within the United Kingdom; and, second, for the purposes of that trade there must be what is called an authorized person as regular agent of the non-resident trader.

The claim to income tax in the present case relates to the five tax years 1940/1941 to 1944/1945 inclusive. That was a period of severe war-time restriction in this country upon trading between the United Kingdom and foreign parts. That matter I have mentioned because it has, as will be seen, some bearing upon this case.

The non-resident sought to be taxed is a company known as the Firestone Tire and Rubber Export Co., being a company incorporated, I think, in the state of Maine but having its principal place of business in the city of Akron in the state of Ohio in the United States. I will call that company, hereafter, "Akron."

The alleged regular agent which is to be taxed on behalf of the non-resident Akron is an English company known as the Firestone Tyre and Rubber Co. Ltd., whose factory and offices and place of business are at Brentford in the environs of London. That company I will refer to as "Brentford." Brentford is in fact wholly controlled, as the judge pointed out, by Akron; but I agree, of course, with Sir James Millard Tucker that one cannot disregard the effect of the separate legal entity which Brentford is; one cannot answer the question raised in this appeal by treating Brentford as though it were a mere emanation of Akron.

The questions which we have to decide in the sense that I have anticipated, after my reference to the Income Tax Act and the rules, can now be restated in the terms in which I find them in paragraph 2 of the case stated. "The questions," said the Commissioners, "for determination before us were as follows ". . ."—I leave out (a)—". . . (b) whether Akron was exer- "cising within the United Kingdom a trade of selling tyres to "persons outside the United Kingdom; and, if so, (c) whether "that trade was carried on by Akron through the agency of "Brentford."

It is a trite observation that in every case which comes before the courts the answer in the end must depend upon its particular facts. The facts of the present case are undoubtedly in many respects special and peculiar. As Sir James said, the old cases in which the question of taxing non-resident persons came before the courts (for example, the cases compendiously referred to as the "champagne" cases) were cases, generally speaking, where the non-resident sold in the United Kingdom goods made abroad; and it was in particular reference to the cases of that type that Lord Cave L.C., in Maclaine & Co. v. Eccott,[1] used language which has been quoted many times before, as it has been quoted in the present case. "The question," said Lord Cave L.C.,[2] "whether a trade is exercised in the United Kingdom is a "question of fact, and it is undesirable to attempt to lay down "any exhaustive test of what constitutes such an exercise of "trade; but I think it must now be taken as established that in "the case of a merchant's business, the primary object of which "is to sell goods at a profit, the trade is (speaking generally) "exercised or carried on (I do not myself see much difference "between the two expressions) at the place where the contracts "are made. No doubt reference has sometimes been made to "the place where payment is made for the goods sold or to the "place where the goods are delivered, and it may be that in "certain circumstances these are material considerations; but "the most important, and indeed the crucial, question is, where "are the contracts of sale made?"

The present case is on its facts very different in material respects from the type of case exemplified by the "champagne" cases. Indeed, in some respects it may be said to be the converse of them, since the goods here in question were made in the United Kingdom and were then sold abroad.

I turn to a statement of what I will call the Akron business. [His Lordship read the finding of fact stated in paragraph 4 of the stated case, and continued:] Whether the particular company sought here to be taxed, Firestone Tyre and Rubber Export Co., itself manufactures tyres is not a matter which appears to be proved in evidence, but I assume—and I base myself upon the finding of the commissioners—that this company is at any rate a member of, and an important member of, the general Akron organization; and the business of that organization is that of the marketing and distribution of Firestone tyres and other Firestone products. I observe that Firestone tyres are branded articles. The name Firestone, besides being in fact a trade mark, is part, and a valuable part, of the goodwill of Akron. I assume also that tyres which bear that mark as a guarantee of the reputation of Firestone are made in accordance with some particular process, whether patented or not, and that process again is part, and a valuable part, of the business undertaking and property of Akron.

The distribution of Firestone products outside the United States, and particularly in Europe, appears to be conducted by Akron through distributors under "distributor" agreements. I shall refer presently to the one which we have taken as a sample. But the substance of the obligation put upon such distributors was that they were bound to promote the sales in their countries of Firestone products and not to sell any competing products themselves at the same time.

In order that such a distributor should get supplies, Akron have also established, as the case mentions, as part of their organization controlled manufacturing companies (of which Brentford is one) whose function it is to make Firestone tyres and Firestone products according to the strict directions and specifications of Akron, and to dispose of those tyres subject to, and only subject to, the terms imposed by Akron.

I will now refer to the distributor agreement which has been called "the master agreement," and is typical of the type of agreement made by Akron with its distributors. I will call it the Swedish master agreement for it is made between the Firestone Tyre and Rubber Export Co. and a company situated in Stockholm. It is desirable that I should read a certain amount of this agreement because a good deal of the argument has turned upon its true effect. The first clause is this: "The company," that is Akron, "hereby grants to the distributor"—I will call the distributor "Sweden"—"upon the terms and conditions herein-"after mentioned, the exclusive right to sell Firestone branded ". . ." tyres, etc., in the territory of Sweden, and in consideration of that grant Sweden agrees to buy, sell and distribute such Firestone branded products exclusively, to keep on hand a sufficient stock to meet demand, and to use their best endeavours to promote the sale and distribution, etc.

Clause 2: "Prices: Subject to the company's right"—that is, Akron's right—"to change prices . . . the distributor shall "be entitled to the prices . . ." on the branded tyres as per attached lists. The lists in fact were not attached to our copy, but we understood from Sir James that, as is common I take it with most branded articles, there was a controlled price which Sweden had to pay and a controlled price at which Sweden had to sell. Then there was a provision for permitting Akron to change the prices.

Clause 3: "Deliveries: The company [Akron] will make "deliveries f.a.s. vessel provided always that the shipment shall "weigh . . ." so much. "Delivery to carrier shall constitute "delivery to distributor."

Clause 4: "Terms: The terms of the company [Akron] shall "be 90 days' sight draft, documents against acceptance." There are the provisions about changes in price which I can pass over, and a further obligation on the distributor to keep stocks on hand. Clause 9 provides that Akron reserves the right to sell Firestone products to companies and others who customarily purchase their tyres in the United States, etc., even though such products may be shipped to the distributor's territory, that is Sweden.

Clause 12 says that Akron "shall not be liable for delays or "failures to make delivery of goods ordered hereunder occasioned "by war, fires, the elements, labour trouble, interruption or "shortage of transportation facilities, inability to obtain goods, "or from any cause beyond the control of the company."

Clause 13: "It is understood and agreed that this agreement "is not to be construed as constituting the distributor an agent "of the company for any purpose whatever."

Clause 14: "The contract between the parties hereto is fully "set forth in this agreement and has been entered into under "the considerations herein expressed and no others, and shall "become effective only when executed by the duly authorized "representatives of the company at Akron, Ohio, it being agreed "that this agreement is to be construed under the laws of the "state of Ohio in the United States of America"; and it is not to be altered or modified except by written endorsement, and so forth. There is a power of cancellation which is irrelevant.

Upon the face of it, it seems to me clear enough that the effect of that master agreement was, although it was implicit perhaps rather than clearly expressed, that Akron would itself sell to Sweden such tyres and other products as Sweden should require, or at least would provide the tyres and so forth that Sweden would require at the prices and subject to the other conditions contained in the agreement. I pause to observe that throughout the case and in the other documents Sweden has been treated as and called a customer of Akron.

I now pass to the second master agreement, again a typical one of a kind, namely, the agreement between Akron and Brentford, which I will call the Brentford master agreement. That came into being in 1936, but, as the case shows and as one can find from the judgment of the judge, Brentford had been in existence for a good many years before that date. For present purposes I think none of the previous history matters. The Brentford master agreement was as follows: "(1) In considera-"tion of the payment by the American company 'Akron' herein-"after mentioned the English company 'Brentford' will from "time to time use its best endeavours to fulfil either by manu-"facture or from its existing stocks all orders obtained in Europe "or elsewhere by the American company as and when requested "so to do by the American company. (2) The American company "shall upon each request being made forward to the English com-"pany full particulars of such order. (3) The English company "shall upon the receipt of such order with all possible dispatch "forward the goods thereby ordered to the purchaser and shall "give such instructions for payment of the purchase price by "the purchaser as shall be requested by the American company. "(4) In consideration of the above mentioned services the "American company will pay to the English company in the "manner hereinafter mentioned a sum equal to the cost price "to the English company of the goods supplied hereunder plus "five per centum thereof." Then the expression "cost price" is defined. Clause 5 provides for there being accounts between the parties. Clause 6 states that the agreement should continue for a period, but the fact is that it has continued ever since. It is to be noted, for what it is worth, that unlike the Swedish master agreement the agreement does not provide that nothing in the agreement should constitute for any purpose Brentford as the agent of Akron.

Upon the face of the document it is, I think, clearly contemplated that, when Akron received from any of its customers or purchasers an order, it would or might pass that order on to Brentford for execution with such directions as to price and so on as it then gave. Brentford would be bound to execute it, or at least to use its best endeavours so to do.

The case then, upon the face of the documents, would be fairly analogous to the example given by Sir James of the man who desires to present to the lady of his choice a bunch of flowers, and orders them from a florist. The florist, not being able in fact to supply those flowers, will get another florist so to do, and the lady receives in due course the flowers in fact from the second florist. In that case (and I daresay the result would be similar if the arrangement had gone strictly according to the letter of the master agreement) it is at least probable that the second florist never enters into any contractual relations with the customer who orders the flowers.

But the fact is that things did not work out quite as the agreements, on the face of them, stated that they should. That, I think, undoubtedly was partly due to the English war-time controls which rendered Brentford unable to comply with any orders for tyres save such as the appropriate governmental authority either permitted or indeed directed them to do. The way in which the main difference in practice arose was this, that the orders were not sent to Akron by Sweden and then passed on to Brentford. They were sent direct to Brentford. It is not in doubt that the variation in procedure was authorized, and that in fact Akron gave to those customers or distributors a list of persons or firms in European and other countries to whom they could send, direct, their orders.

The method of business activity is again best found in the case itself, and I think it desirable to read from the case, particularly since one passage I am about to read constitutes a deliberate finding of fact. [His Lordship read paragraphs 12 and 16 (c) of the case, and went on:] It may be said that, since there was difficulty in transmitting money from the United Kingdom to America, the amounts for which Brentford were accountable to Akron were treated as though they were loans by Akron to Brentford.

I will dispose first of all of two particular transactions, namely, supplies of Firestone tyres first to the Government of New Zealand and, second, to the Government of France in Great Britain, the so-called Free French Government. These two orders covered goods to the value of £49,000 out of a total of goods with which this case is concerned amounting to £782,000. The supplies to the New Zealand and Free French Governments were not in fact in accordance with the Akron/Brentford arrangements or the Akron master agreements; they were directed by the British Government. They were, however, treated by Brentford quoad Akron as though they had been within the scope of the master agreements; and the Crown has in fact—no one can say that it was not fair and just so to do—been content to treat them as though they were in consimili casu with the whole of the rest of the transactions. I say no more about those particular orders.

To illustrate my judgment let me take an imaginary order coming from Stockholm, Sweden, for, say, 1,000 tyres. They send direct to Brentford an order for 1,000 Firestone tyres. Brentford, having regard to the terms of the Brentford master agreement, may not have been bound to accept the order, and, indeed, having regard to the war-time controls, might not have been able to accept it; but I am supposing the case that Brentford accepts the order. It supplies all the tyres, and in accordance now with the terms of the written master agreements it delivers them f.a.s., and that constitutes delivery to Sweden. For the rest, the transaction is, as between Brentford and Sweden, in all respects governed by the dictates of Akron in accordance with the Swedish master agreement, that is to say, all the details as to the price to be charged, the method of collection, delivery, and so forth.

What then, on a true analysis, is the result of a transaction taking that form? Sir James has said that there are two results. Either, first, the sole trading operation was an operation between Sweden on the one hand and Brentford on the other, an English contract, becoming in due course an English sale; the arrangement between Brentford and Akron about the subsequent apportionment of the purchase price collected is something altogether outside the scope of the trading operation; it therefore follows, as night the day, that Akron is not trading or carrying on a trade within the United Kingdom. Or, second, a contract upon the giving by Sweden of the order comes into existence, a new contract between Sweden and Akron, or alternatively a contract between Brentford and Akron, with the purpose or having the effect that the 1,000 tyres which are to be delivered to Sweden become the property of Akron. In either case there is a point of time when the property passes to Akron, and from that time forward the transaction is exclusively governed by the terms of the Swedish master agreement, which is an agreement made out of England and governed by the laws of the state of Ohio; and, therefore, it follows also that Akron is not carrying on a trade within the United Kingdom at all.

As the argument developed, of the two horses (if I may use a substantial variation of the metaphor which Harman J. used) Sir James rode the former rather harder than the latter; though I think that when he opened the case, and (as I noted from the judgment of Harman J.) when he put his case in the court

1956
FIRESTONE TYRE AND RUBBER CO. LTD. v. LEWELLIN (INSPECTOR OF TAXES).
Lord Evershed M.R.

below, he presented as the favourite the second of the two horses. Certainly the way in which Sir James put the case has all the attractions of simplicity. I think, for myself, that it is too simple, and that when the matter is more closely examined very severe difficulties are found to confront Sir James on both heads of his argument, difficulties which form rocks like the rocks of Scylla and Charybdis to which Harman J. alluded. In my judgment Harman J. came to a correct conclusion, for I think that neither of Sir James's propositions can be, on examination, established.

First, to revert to my imagined simple case, I think that upon the order being given by Sweden and accepted by Brentford there arises between Brentford and Sweden a contract of sale made in England, a contract which according to the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, becomes a sale when, in accordance with the other arrangements, the tyres are delivered by Brentford f.a.s. I reject, as did the judge, the notion that there arose at some point of time what I think was aptly described by Harman J. as a philosophical contract between Brentford and Akron sufficient to pass the property in those tyres from Brentford to Akron before delivery. It is, I think, possible—the judge assumed it was the fact, but I do not myself go so far—that when Sweden sends its order to Brentford there also arises a subsidiary contract, that is, subsidiary to the Swedish master agreement, between Sweden and Akron on the footing that, properly construed, the Swedish master agreement operated as a continuing offer by Akron to sell or to provide tyres, that offer being accepted when Sweden gave an order for tyres in pursuance of and in reliance upon it. I think that if such a fresh contract came into existence it would occupy a very subsidiary and ancillary position. If, for example, to go back again to my case, Brentford committed some default, having accepted the order, I think that on my analysis Sweden would be entitled to sue Brentford for breach of contract. I think it may be that Sweden could also sue Akron under the Swedish master agreement for having failed to provide the tyres; and it may also be that Sweden could set up against Akron what I have called a subsidiary and ancillary contract also; but having stated as best I can the effect of that supposed breach I think it will be seen at once that on my analysis any such contract between Akron and Sweden is of a purely incidental character.

But its possibility has, I think, some aspects of danger about it for Sir James, and for this reason. We do not know the exact arrangements whereby communications passed, and were intended to pass, between Sweden and Akron. Assuming that there was by the Swedish master agreement a continuing offer, it may be that acceptance, so as to create contractual relations, must first be communicated to the offeror, and that it would not suffice to create a contract that Sweden merely put the order in the Swedish post office box. If that is right, then the communication in the case I suppose was—and Sir James, I think, conceded as much—made not to Akron direct but to Brentford, and Brentford must at least be the agent of Akron to receive communication of the acceptance with the possible result (I say no more) that, even on the second of the two alternatives which Sir James put forward, there would arise a contract with Akron in England because the acceptance of the offer was communicated to Akron via its agents in England. I need not, however, pursue further that aspect of it. It suffices, in my judgment, to state, as I have done, that on the happening of the case I am supposing of Sweden sending an order for tyres to Brentford, there came into existence in England a contract for sale between Brentford and Sweden.

If that is so, is Akron carrying on a trade within the United Kingdom? In my judgment it is. In my judgment the typical English contract of sale between Brentford and Sweden which I have supposed is an incident, and an incident deliberately contrived, of Akron's business of marketing and distributing Firestone branded tyres in England and in Europe, and indeed in every country of the world. I do not repeat all the matters which I have previously mentioned as to the nature of the articles which are supplied, but merely state compendiously by way of reminder that Firestone tyres are branded proprietary articles of the Akron organization.

My conclusion does not involve the proposition that Brentford, instead of being an independent legal entity, is a mere branch of Akron; but Brentford, though a separate entity, is in fact wholly controlled by Akron, and in the making of what may be described as Akron proprietary branded articles it acts under the close direction of Akron in all respects, and in selling those articles to Akron's customers it does so on terms fixed by Akron, so that after allowing Brentford its costs and a percentage thereon the whole of the profits on the transactions go to Akron.

We were referred in the course of the argument, as was the judge, to Weiss, Biheller & Brooks Ltd. v. Farmer,[3] in which a Dutch company (which manufactured gas mantles in the Netherlands) made a business arrangement with an English company for the distribution and marketing of its gas mantles here. The substance of the arrangement was that the Dutch company sold the gas mantles first to the English company, the two companies acting as principals, vendors and purchasers, and then the English company sold them again to customers in England, again acting as principal, as vendor. Ultimately, the profits of those transactions were divided between the Dutch and the English companies, in certain proportions. I do not suggest that that case is entirely parallel with the present case, and the reference in the somewhat obscurely worded agreement between the Dutch company and the English company to del credere certainly lends much force to the view that the English company was, in some respects at any rate, regarded as an agent of the Dutch company. But the case does, I think, show, and it is an illustration of the principle, that the fact that the English company, when it sells particular goods, sells them as a principal to the customers does not negative a proposition that the parent company, from which in some sense or another the goods emanated, may not equally be carrying on or exercising a trade within the United Kingdom. I think that the case which I have mentioned was rightly regarded by Harman J. as lending some support to the view which he formed.

C. A.

There remains the third and final question. If Akron is carrying on this trade within the United Kingdom, then for the purposes of rules 5 and 10 is Brentford its "regular" agent? To my mind, the answer to that question must be in the affirmative. If the conclusion is right that Akron is trading in the United Kingdom, then it must be doing so through someone's agency, since, admittedly, Akron is not itself here, nor are any of its officers, nor has it got here any branch or office. Indeed, as I understood him, Sir James did not really argue otherwise than that, given the premise that Akron was exercising a trade in the United Kingdom, and doing so by means of or as a result of Brentford's sale transactions, Brentford really must be treated as a regular agent within the terms of rule 10. There certainly could not be any doubt, having regard to the Brentford master agreement, that if Brentford is for this purpose an agent at all, it certainly is a regular agent, and not merely (to use the phrase to be found in the cases) an irrelevant agent.

The view of the case which I have taken makes it unnecessary for me to discuss the further question also debated before us, namely, whether, on the assumption that contracts for sale to Sweden of tyres were contracts with Akron made outside the United Kingdom and governed by United States law, Akron was still trading here—that is, exercising a trade within the United Kingdom—because so many incidents of the performance of the contract (for example, delivery, receipt of the purchase price, and so forth) took place here: in other words, the point that the exceptional facts of this case take the matter out of the general rule enunciated by Lord Cave L.C. in Maclaine & Co. v. Eccott[4] in the passage which I have already cited. The judge was inclined to the view that an affirmative answer should be given to that question, that the case was one so exceptional in its facts that he could invoke, to support his answer, the language used, for example, by Atkin L.J. in the earlier case of F. L. Smidth & Co. v. Greenwood,[5] where the Lord Justice said[6]: "I think that the question is, where do the operations take "place from which the profits in substance arise?" In the view which I have taken it is unnecessary for me to discuss that matter, and I, therefore, prefer, for my part, to express no conclusion about it; but for the reasons which I have earlier given I think Harman J. came to a correct conclusion, and I would dismiss this appeal.

JENKINS L.J. I agree. I need not repeat at length the facts stated in the case, or refer again in detail to the distributor agreement or the agreement of February 8, 1936, between Akron and Brentford.

The question whether Akron was during the relevant years exercising a trade within the United Kingdom through the agency of Brentford is a question of fact which the Special Commissioners have answered in the affirmative, and their decision upon that question, as the tribunal of fact, is not to be disturbed on appeal, unless the facts as found by them are incapable in law of supporting such a decision.

Sir James has argued before us with his usual persuasive force that on the facts found, and on a proper appreciation of the legal effect of the distributor agreement and the agreement of 1936, and of the course of dealing between Akron and Brentford and the various distributors whose orders were dealt with by Brentford, the only proper conclusion as a matter of law is that Akron was not at any material time exercising a trade within the United Kingdom, or at all events was not exercising a trade within the United Kingdom through the agency of Brentford.

The effect of Sir James's argument may, I think, be thus fairly summarized:

(i) Akron and all the distributors whose orders for tyres are material to the case were resident outside the United Kingdom, and the distributor agreement entered into between Akron and each of these distributors was made outside the United Kingdom.

(ii) Each of the distributor agreements amounted to a standing offer by Akron to supply the distributor concerned with tyres as and when ordered by such distributor. If the terms of the distributor agreements had been strictly adhered to, the distributors would have given their orders for tyres to Akron, and each such order would have constituted an acceptance of Akron's standing offer, and thus have given rise to a contract between Akron and the distributor concerned for the sale by the former to the latter of the tyres ordered—see Pollock on Contracts, 13th ed., at p. 141. The acceptance would be complete on the dispatch by the distributor in his own country by post or cable of his order for tyres. The contract would thus be made in the distributor's country of residence, that is to say, outside the United Kingdom.

(iii) If the terms of the distributor agreements had been strictly adhered to, the position under the agreement of 1936 between Akron and Brentford would have been that, as and when contracts for the sale of tyres by Akron to distributors were concluded in the way above described, Akron, if so minded, would

Jenkins L.J.

have passed them to Brentford to carry out under the agreement of 1936; and, thereupon, as between Brentford and Akron, Brentford would have been bound, so far as it was able, to fulfil those contracts on the terms as to remuneration and otherwise contained in that agreement.

(iv) It follows that, if the terms of the distributor agreements had been strictly complied with, Akron might well have been carrying on a trade of selling tyres to distributors outside the United Kingdom, but could not have been exercising that trade within the United Kingdom because all the contracts for the sale of tyres would have been made outside the United Kingdom; and the balance of authority is strongly in favour of the view that a merchanting trade, that is to say, a trade concerned with the sale of goods, is (generally speaking) carried on in the place where the contracts are made—see, for example, Maclaine & Co. v. Eccott,[7] per Lord Cave L.C. The fact that a non-resident trader, who has made a contract outside the United Kingdom with another non-resident for a sale of goods to the latter, obtains those goods from a trader resident in the United Kingdom is not enough to displace the general rule so as to make the trade of either non-resident a trade exercised within the United Kingdom: see Sulley v. Attorney-General,[8] and the distinction drawn by Lord Herschell in Grainger & Son v. Gough[9] between trading with a country and carrying on trade within a country.

(v) The fact that the strict terms of the distributor agreements were departed from in practice (both before and after the date of the agreement of 1936), so as to allow distributors to order any tyres they required from any listed manufacturer of Firestone tyres selected by them, does not affect the above conclusion. The distributor's order addressed to any listed manufacturer equally raised a contract made outside the United Kingdom between Akron and the distributor concerned immediately upon the dispatch by letter or cable of the distributor's order, the listed manufacturers simply playing the role of agents empowered to receive such orders on Akron's behalf.

(vi) If the foregoing submissions in their application to the practice actually followed are wrong, and the effect of that practice was to make an order for tyres addressed to Brentford an offer requiring the acceptance of Brentford in England, so that the contract in each case was made in this country, that does not make good the contention that Akron was exercising a trade within the United Kingdom; for on this footing the contracts were contracts with Brentford for the sale by Brentford to the distributors concerned of Brentford's tyres, not Akron's tyres, and the trade exercised in the United Kingdom was Brentford's, not Akron's. This merely resuscitates the Crown's abandoned claim that Brentford was carrying on on its own account the trade of selling tyres to persons resident outside the United Kingdom, and cannot assist the case for the Crown on the present appeal.

[8] (1860) 2 T.C. 149; 5 H. & N. 711.

(vii) In any case, and on any view of the matter, the tyres supplied or sold by Brentford to distributors outside the United Kingdom were Brentford's own tyres, not Akron's, as appears from the terms of the agreement of 1936; and it is a legal impossibility for a person to sell his own goods as agent for another—see the distinction drawn in W. T. Lamb & Sons v. Goring Brick Co. Ltd.[10] between the relationships of vendor and purchaser and principal and agent. It follows that Brentford cannot have been selling its own tyres to distributors as agent for Akron, and it follows further that Brentford must either have been selling on its own account to distributors outside the United Kingdom (a theory which, as appears above, cannot advance the case for the Crown) or else must be regarded as having been selling to Akron, at a price corresponding to the rate of remuneration fixed by the agreement of 1936, the tyres required by Akron to fill contracts made by Akron outside the United Kingdom with non-resident distributors. In neither alternative could it be held that Akron was exercising a trade within the United Kingdom, and Brentford has already been assessed to the whole of the tax which would be payable on the footing that it was, as part of its own trade, selling to Akron.

In my judgment, whatever the position might have been if the terms of the distributor agreements had been strictly adhered to, Sir James's argument breaks down on the course of dealing actually followed. An order placed by a distributor direct with Brentford as one of the listed manufacturers of Firestone tyres could at most only create a contract between the distributor and Akron to the effect that the distributor would purchase, and Akron would cause the manufacturer to sell to the distributor, the tyres ordered on the terms and conditions of the distributor agreement. There was no privity of contract between distributor and manufacturer quoad the distributor agreement, and it is, I think, quite impossible to hold that the mere placing of an order with any one of the listed manufacturers would, without more, oblige that manufacturer to deliver the tyres ordered. As between the distributor and the listed manufacturer the matter must have been one of offer and acceptance, that is to say, an order placed by the distributor with the manufacturer and accepted by the latter. The order and its acceptance would alone constitute the effective contract under which the distributor could call upon the manufacturer to deliver the tyres ordered, and would be bound on his own part to take and pay for them. Such contracts in the case of Brentford would be made in England as the place of acceptance. On applying this view of the contractual position to the facts found, it appears that during the material period Brentford was selling to distributors abroad, under contracts made in the United Kingdom, tyres manufactured by Brentford in the United Kingdom, and deliverable in the United Kingdom to the purchasers thereof against payment in the United Kingdom of the contract price; and, furthermore, was in fact effecting delivery of and receiving payment for such tyres in the United Kingdom.

Firestone Tyre and Rubber Co. Ltd. v. Lewellin (Inspector of Taxes).
Jenkins L.J

It further appears upon reference to the agreement of 1936 that Brentford was under contract with Akron to do these things as services to Akron in return for a stipulated remuneration, subject to which all profits arising were to belong to Akron.

In these circumstances I am of opinion that there was ample evidence to justify the Special Commissioners in concluding, as they did, that Akron during the relevant years was exercising a trade in the United Kingdom through the agency of Brentford. Moreover, I cannot regard this conclusion as displaced by the circumstance that the tyres sold by Brentford were Brentford's and not Akron's. This seems to me to be mere machinery which did not affect the substance of the relationship of Akron and Brentford in regard to the trade in question, which, in my view, was Akron's trade carried on by Brentford on behalf of and for the benefit of, or in other words as agent for, Akron.

I think that the argument for the Crown on the question of agency derives some assistance from Weiss, Biheller & Brooks Ltd. v. Farmer.[11]

I entirely agree with the views as to the relations between Akron and Brentford thus expressed by the Special Commissioners in paragraph 16 (d) of the case. [His Lordship read the paragraph, and continued:] I am accordingly of opinion that the Special Commissioners and the judge came to a right conclusion in this matter, and I would dismiss this appeal

Birkett L.J. I agree with the two judgments which have just been delivered. Nevertheless, I should like to express my own view about the proper answer to this case.

When Sir James Millard Tucker opened this case, within his opening sentences he said that there were two questions, and two questions only, for the determination of the court. The first question, of course, was whether the company which we have agreed to call "Akron," the American master company, was exercising a trade within the United Kingdom. The second question was whether Brentford, that is the wholly-owned subsidiary of Akron in this country, was the authorized regular agent of Akron for that purpose?

Quite clearly, the first question is a question of the greatest importance. If it is answered in the affirmative that Akron was carrying on a trade within the United Kingdom, the second question really becomes academic on the facts of this case. But everybody agreed that the answer to that question, propounded by Sir James and discussed for several days in this court, depended upon the view taken of the facts in the case.

As Sir James said, this question of non-resident firms and corporations carrying on business within the United Kingdom had been a matter of very fierce dispute in days past, and, indeed, had been the subject of many decisions which were cited to us. He said, with an air of slight surprise, it was curious that after a long interval of time the ancient question, which all had thought to be settled by these authorities, should be raised again.

But the facts of this case are extremely unusual, and many of the cases which were cited to us were cited to try to bring those facts within decisions which the courts had laid down. I am not going through all those. Let me take one illustration only. Sir James said that this question whether or not a non-resident trader is exercising a trade within the United Kingdom can be decided by this test, and it is a test that is a crucial and a practical one. The test is, where are the contracts of sale which are in question made? He cited in support of that the views of Lord Herschell and Lord Watson, and the concurring speech of Lord Macnaghten in Grainger & Son v. Gough.[12] That is your test. Where are the contracts made? It is not enough, for example, that on the facts of this case payment was to be made in England; it is not enough that delivery was to be made in England; it is not enough that orders for tyres were received in England. All that does not really matter. The crucial test laid down in the cases is where are the contracts made; and, of course, in support of that argument, Sir James was concerned to show that the contracts with which we are concerned were made abroad.

The distributor agreement between Akron and the firm in Sweden, which we have agreed to call "Sweden," in substance said: "We, Akron, the American company, will provide you in "Sweden with Firestone tyres. You shall have the exclusive "right to sell Firestone tyres throughout Sweden—and nobody "else. We shall provide them for you, in consideration for which "you will undertake to buy your tyres only from us." Sir James thereupon said that meant, although the word was not used, "We will sell you all the tyres," and that meant Akron was saying that to Sweden by this agreement, "We agree to sell, "and you agree to buy," and, therefore, the contract was made abroad.

Then Sir James said that by a clause of the agreement made with Brentford, which was an agreement subsequently entered into, "We arranged with Brentford merely to supply those goods "which we had sold." In support of that argument it was really necessary to say that at some moment before the delivery of the order to Sweden there had been somehow and in some form a sale of the tyres from Brentford to Akron. If 1,000 tyres were ordered by Sweden, and the order was sent direct to Brentford, and then Brentford sent the 1,000 tyres, they were in fact the tyres of Akron; and it was all done in pursuance of a non-resident making a contract outside the United Kingdom.

I am bound to say that, as the argument developed and as its effect developed, it seemed almost impossible to maintain that position, for at some subsequent date—one was never given any very clear view about how it had happened—there was a modification of the written agreement which had been made between Akron and Brentford. The agreement had specified in the beginning, "Whereas the parties hereto are desirous of "concluding an arrangement for the fulfilling by the English "company of orders obtained in Europe and elsewhere by the "American company" and by clause 2, "The American com- "pany shall upon each request being made forward to the English "company full particulars of such order," which seemed to forecast that the course of business would have been that Sweden would say to Akron, "I want 1,000 tyres" and Akron, therefore, under the agreement would say to Brentford, "Here are "particulars of an order which we desire you to fulfil on the "terms we have agreed in this agreement as to payment, price, "delivery and so on," but there came a moment when that was clearly modified because we had to deal with the case upon the footing that there was no such communication between Sweden and Akron; that although there was undoubtedly the original agreement made between Akron and Sweden, the distributor agreement, from which everything else flowed, apart from that it was safe to say that Akron did nothing except to receive the main profit on the transaction because all that really happened was that Sweden sent direct in this case to Brentford. Although it was entitled, if it cared, to send to any other particular subsidiary company of Akron, it sent in this case to Brentford; and Brentford thereupon fufilled the order. If the order was for 1,000 tyres, Brentford, without any reference to Akron, sent 1,000 tyres; it delivered them f.a.s. according to the terms of the agreement; it charged prices which Akron had laid down that it should charge; it received the money in the form which Akron had laid down it should receive the money; it accounted for the property in the manner in which Akron had desired it should so account; and it retained for itself 5 per cent. upon the cost price which had been laid down in the agreement for the services it had rendered in the matter.

It is true in substance to say that, apart from entering into the original agreement and receiving the profits on every transaction which arose out of it, Akron did nothing; and therefore it seemed, at least to me, to be quite impossible to maintain the position which Sir James was taking up, that this was a contract made abroad, that that was the crucial test, and that delivery and price did not really matter in the result, and we ought to say, therefore, that there was no trading within the United Kingdom. The view which I myself held was that this particular form of trading was clearly a trade within the United Kingdom. When Brentford received an order for 1,000 tyres it was an order which was being given by Sweden to Brentford, and Brentford could either accept or reject that order; but the contract which was made between Sweden and Brentford was one which I think was clearly made in England; and that contract in that form and in that way was devised and designed, I think, by Akron as part of its world-wide trade.

The case stated has set out the position, I think quite admirably, in paragraphs 4 and 5, which I do not propose to read at length. "Akron, an American Corporation registered in "Akron, Ohio, is the head of a world-wide organization con- "sisting of a large group of corporations operating in America "and in various parts of the world." If one is going to look at the facts of the case, that I think is one of the overriding and over-mastering facts which enters into every subsequent stage of the matter. Akron is the head and the trunk of all the vast organization, and Brentford a wholly-owned subsidiary of that head, on the terms of the documents before us doing that which Akron has devised and designed that it should do. "Some of "its associated and subsidiary corporations manufacture and sell "tyres . . ."—as, indeed, did Brentford—". . . in the countries "in which they are registered, and others sell in the countries "in which they are registered, tyres which have been manufac- "tured in America or by subsidiary corporations in other "countries. For convenience, certain matters in regard to the "business of the organization carried on outside the United States "of America have been conducted by other subsidiary companies "of Akron. . . . Brentford is an English company registered in "1922 with an issued capital of £20,000 in £1 ordinary shares. "This capital was increased to £140,000 in 1938. All the "shares in Brentford are owned by Akron. The board of directors "of Brentford consists of individuals resident in the United "Kingdom with the exception of Mr. Harvey Firestone, the "chairman of the board of directors of Akron, who is a director "of Brentford and occasionally attends meetings of its directors." Then it gives the history of that company which formerly used to sell the tyres manufactured in America, but then it became an economic, commercial proposition for the company to make the tyres here, and so it did. It was doing that admittedly in this case.

Lord Evershed M.R. has pointed out that the thing sold was a branded article, Firestone tyres. The trade mark, patents and processes no doubt all belong to the thing sold called a Firestone tyre, and Brentford could not sell to anybody that particular tyre without the consent of Akron because Akron was the owner of that very valuable thing which made the distinctive Firestone tyre. Here was a distributor agreement made between Akron and Sweden. Sweden sent this contract for these Firestone tyres to Brentford, and whilst it would be possible to analyse it in a little more detail it is not necessary because it has already been done. But it seems to me so plain that this is a contract between Sweden and Brentford, devised and designed by Akron, the overriding master company. It is quite true, as Lord Evershed M.R. has said, that one must always recognize that Brentford has a separate and a distinct entity of its own, but it was part of the regular business of Akron that this trade which we have been analysing in this case should go on. It was part of its world-wide organization. As I have pointed out, the real profits of that trade went to Akron. The only money retained above cost price was 5 per cent., expressly stated to be for services to be rendered. All the elements of delivery, price and so on were made in this country, and I cannot doubt that the answer to the first question, "Does Akron exercise a trade within the United "Kingdom?" must be given quite clearly and firmly as "Yes."

With regard to the second question, I really have nothing to add because Lord Evershed M.R. has pointed out that if that answer is right, that Akron is carrying on a trade within the United Kingdom, it must be trading through Brentford. It is not suggested that there would be anybody but Brentford, and I should hold myself that in those circumstances it follows that Brentford here was the regular authorized agent for that purpose of Akron. I feel this question should be answered in that way.

I think the judgment of Harman J. was right, and that this appeal should be dismissed.

Ceylon.

† Present: LORD OAKSEY, LORD TUCKER, LORD COHEN, LORD KEITH OF AVONHOLM and MR. L. M. D. DE SILVA.

The appellant, an insurance company in Ceylon, transacted some of its business through canvassers who were paid a commission but received no salary; it also employed "field officers" or "field organizers" who were paid a small salary and an overriding commission on business introduced through them, and whose duty it was to supervise and control the canvassers. It was left to the canvasser or field officer to select the doctor who would examine proponents in respect of proposals for life insurance. The respondent, a doctor selected by a canvasser to examine proponents for him, went for that purpose in a motor-car belonging to a field officer, but subject to a hire-purchase agreement with the appellant company. Travelling in the car were the respondent doctor, the canvasser and the field officer. As the result of an accident due to the negligent driving of the canvasser, the doctor was injured, and he claimed damages from the appellant company:—

Held, that the field officer was a servant of the appellant company and that in making the journey in the car which had been supplied to him for the purpose of carrying out his duties he was acting in the course of and for the purposes of his employment. He was in control of the car—though not actually driving—and was liable for the negligence of the canvasser since the latter was a person over whom he had a right to exercise control. The field officer was exercising control over the car as a servant of the appellant company and on its behalf, and any consequential liability attaching to him was a liability of the company.

Judgment of the Supreme Court of Ceylon affirmed.

APPEAL (No. 26 of 1955) from a judgment and decree of the Supreme Court of Ceylon (October 29, 1953) setting aside a judgment and decree of the District Court of Colombo (March 8, 1951).

The following facts are taken from the judgment of the Judicial Committee: The respondent (hereinafter referred to as "the plaintiff") suffered personal injuries by reason of the negligent driving by one Holsingher of a motor-car in which he was a passenger on a journey from Colombo to Jaffna on April 27, 1950. The question in the appeal was whether the appellant (hereinafter referred to as "the company") was responsible for Holsingher's negligence.

The plaintiffs' claim failed at the trial in the District Court of Colombo on March 8, 1951, but that judgment was reversed on appeal by the Supreme Court of Ceylon on October 29, 1953, when judgment was directed to be entered in his favour for Rs.50,000 with costs.

The company transacted insurance business in Ceylon with its principal place of business and registered office in Colombo. Some of its business came through canvassers who were paid commission on business introduced by them but received no salary. Holsingher was one of those canvassers. The company employed three "field officers" or "field organizers." Their duties were to supervise and control the canvassers and to assist them to bring in business. They were paid a salary of approximately Rs.100 a month and an overriding commission on business introduced through them. They were answerable to the secretary of the company who performed the duties generally carried out by a managing director. Any canvasser or field officer bringing in a proposal for life insurance must forward with it a doctor's certificate with regard to the proponent. It was left to the canvasser or field officer to select the doctor and make the necessary arrangements for medical examinations, but the doctors' fees were paid by the company. Doctors normally provided their own transport. A field officer could not function efficiently without a car. One of those field officers was named Perera. He was supplied with a car by the company under a hire purchase agreement dated July 30, 1948, by which Perera agreed to pay at least Rs.200 a month towards the full purchase price of Rs.5,875, plus interest at 6 per cent. On payment in full the car was to become the property of Perera. The agreement recited that Perera was employed by the company as one of its field officers and that under the conditions of his appointment he was obliged to discharge certain obligations and that with a view to helping him discharge those obligations the company had lent him the money to purchase a car in the name of the company.

There was a conflict of evidence at the trial as to the circumstances in which the plaintiff came to be travelling in the car at the time of the accident. Holsingher's evidence was to the effect that the plaintiff had borrowed the car for his own exclusive benefit in order to fulfil an undertaking to travel to Jaffna at his own cost and expense for the purpose of examining a number of proponents for Holsingher. It was implicit in the judgment of the District Judge that he rejected that story and accepted the plaintiff's version, which was that he had stipulated that transport should be supplied for the journey from Colombo to Jaffna, a distance of 248 miles. Holsingher agreed and arranged with Perera for the use of his car. On the journey there were present in the car the plaintiff, Holsingher, Perera and a paid driver named Gunapala. Perera, Holsingher and Gunapala took turns in driving the car. At the time of the accident Holsingher was driving and Perera was sitting in the back seat.

The plaint was framed on the basis that Holsingher was an employee of the company acting within the scope of his employment, but the case was argued on the alternative ground that Holsingher was under the control of Perera who was a servant of the company acting on its behalf. The judge dealt with the case on that basis without requiring any amendment of the pleading and no objection was taken to that course at any stage of the proceedings. He held that Holsingher was not a servant of the company nor was Perera when driving the car on that journey, and that if the accident had happened while he was driving the company would not have been liable. Consequently no liability could attach to the company while Holsingher was driving.

The Supreme Court (Gratiaen and de Silva JJ.) reversed that judgment on the ground that Perera was a servant of the company and that at no stage had he divested himself of his character as a servant authorized to act on behalf of the company; that throughout the journey the car was through Perera's instrumentality being used on the company's business; that a contractual obligation binding on the company had been entered into by Holsingher with the knowledge and approval of Perera to convey the plaintiff to Jaffna; and that the car was being used as a means of transport which was clearly incidental to the execution of that which Perera was employed to do.

duties he was acting in the course of and for the purposes of his employment. (See Canadian Pacific Railway Co. v. Lockhart.[1]) Accordingly, if the accident had happened while he was actually driving there can be no doubt that the company would have been liable. Can it escape liability because Holsingher was at the wheel at the moment of accident? Their Lordships are of opinion that this question must be answered in the negative. It is now well settled that the person in control of a carriage or motor-vehicle—though not actually driving—is liable for the negligence of the driver over whom he has the right to exercise control. (See Wheatley v. Patrick,[2] Samson v. Aitchison,[3] and Reichardt v. Shard.[4]) Perera was at all times in control of this car. He was exercising that control as a servant of the company on its behalf. Any consequential liability attaching to him is a liability of the company.

Their Lordships do not consider it is necessary for the decision of this case to express any view on the question which was much canvassed at the Bar as to whether Perera had authority to delegate the driving of the car to Holsingher so as to create a direct relationship of master and servant or principal and agent between Holsingher and the company, nor do they base their decision on the view that the company was contractually bound to provide transport for the plaintiff on this journey.

For the reasons indicated above, their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed. The appellant company must pay the respondent's costs of the appeal.

Building—Safety regulations—Application. Building—Safety regulations—Subcontractor—No contractual liability to erect scaffold—Regulation 4.

Contractors for whom the plaintiff worked as foreman bricklayer were engaged on the construction of a building. They engaged the services of subcontractors for the installation of a lift in the building, the arrangement between them being that the contractors should erect the necessary scaffolding. While the main building was still incomplete the brickwork of the lift shaft was finished and the contractors' workmen had left in the lift shaft certain tubular posts running from the front to the rear of the shaft, and necessary for the work of installing the lift. The first step in the installation of the lift was the erection of the main lift runners and for this purpose two of the subcontractors' workmen, accompanied by the plaintiff and P., the contractors' foreman scaffolder, visited the site in order to mark the points at which the bricklayers should bore holes in the brickwork of the shaft. There was at the time no working platform and no planks across the tubular posts at the first-floor level. The plaintiff and P. placed a long ladder for the subcontractors' workmen to climb from the base of the shaft to the first floor level and make their marks on the walls. P. then decided to lower another ladder from the top of the lift shaft and asked the plaintiff to receive it at the first floor. By this time the subcontractors' workmen on their own initiative had erected at the first-floor level a totally inadequate working platform consisting of planks, the majority of which were too short to rest on all three of the tubular posts and which consequently had a number of "trap ends." In order to receive the ladder the plaintiff stepped on the platform, whereupon the planks tipped up, causing him to fall and suffer injury.

In his action against the contractors and subcontractors claiming damages on the ground (inter alia) of breach of statutory duty:—

Held, (1) that the lift and lift runners formed an integral part of the building under construction, that the subcontractors were accordingly contributing towards the construction of the building and were, therefore, engaged on a building operation to which the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, applied.

(2) That the sub-contractors, through the action of their workmen in erecting the working platform, had erected an unsafe scaffold in breach of various of the regulations relating to scaffolds; and the fact that they were not under a contractual obligation to erect any scaffolds was immaterial and did not free them from their duty under regulation 4 as "a contractor and "employer of workmen who erects or alters any scaffold" to comply with the appropriate regulations.

Per Barry J. The second part of this regulation was designed to ensure that no one, whether under a contractual obligation to do so or not, shall erect a scaffold in any building under construction which does not comply with these regulations; that is to say, to ensure that there shall be no unsafe scaffolding in any building which is being constructed.

(3) That the contractors and subcontractors were in breach of regulations 4, 5, 6, 7 (1) and (2), 9, 22 (a) and 23 (2).

ACTION.

The plaintiff, William Leslie Simmons, was employed by the first defendants, Bovis Ltd., as a foreman bricklayer in the construction of a new building at Wallasey, and the second defendants, Pickerings Ltd., had subcontracted with the first defendants for the installation of a lift inside this building.

The brick work of the lift shaft had been completed by the first defendants by May 4, 1954, but some of their workmen were still on the site and the construction of the building was not completed. The first defendants had left in position in the lift shaft certain tubular scaffolding which was necessary to enable the lift engineers to instal the lift. The first step in the installation of the lift was the erection of the main lift runners along the walls of the shaft; and this could not be done until the first defendants' bricklayers had bored holes in the brick work of the lift shaft at such points as the lift engineers' employees might indicate by the use of chalk marks.

On the morning of May 4, 1954, the lift engineers sent two of their employees to the building site to inform the first defendants' bricklayers, and, in particular, their foreman bricklayer.

the plaintiff, of the positions in which holes were to be bored in the brick work. The plaintiff was told by his employers' general foreman to accompany these two workmen to the bottom of the lift shaft so that they could decide what they wished the first defendants' bricklayers to do. After their arrival at the lift shaft the plaintiff asked one Payne, the first defendants' foreman scaffolder, to provide the necessary ladders and a proper platform covering the lift shaft at the first floor level.

The tubular scaffolding inside the lift shaft, which had been erected by Payne, consisted of three tubular posts running from the front portion of the shaft to the rear and clamped to a proper scaffolding which reached to the floor of the lift shaft. Payne had placed a number of scaffold boards cut to the appropriate length on the tubular posts, thereby providing a safe working platform covering the whole of the lift shaft at the first floor level. When the bricklaying operations at that level were complete these boards had been removed to a higher level in the shaft, and, therefore, there was no longer any working platform at the first floor level.

Following the plaintiff's request Payne, with the plaintiff's assistance, obtained a long ladder which would enable the lift engineers' workmen to climb from the base of the shaft up to the first floor level and make their chalk marks on the walls of the shaft. Payne did not see any planks or working platform of any kind at the first floor level as he and the plaintiff raised the long ladder from the well of the shaft up to that level, although there were some planks in position there at that time.

Having placed the long ladder in position Payne asked the plaintiff to go up to the first floor to receive a ladder which he (Payne) proposed to lower from the manhole at the top of the lift shaft. An appreciable time (estimated by Payne as 5 to 10 minutes) elapsed before Payne passed the opening of the lift shaft on the first floor on his way to the top. As he did so he observed that the lift engineers' workmen had erected a platform on the first floor level composed of planks which almost covered the lift shaft at that level. It was a temporary platform erected entirely on the workmen's initiative in their anxiety to hasten the work of chalk marking. With one exception the planks used were of insufficient length to rest upon all of the three tubular girders or poles. The lift engineers' workmen proposed to work on the left hand wall of the shaft and consequently they had laid the planks to rest on the tubular pole nearest to the left hand wall and on the centre tubular pole. Only one of the planks stretched as far as the tubular pole close to the wall on the right hand side of the lift shaft and thus a situation of acute danger had been created.

The working platform constructed by the lift engineers' workmen had a number of "trap-ends"—scaffold boards so placed that their ends overhang to such an extent that when weight is placed upon them they drop and tip up causing the whole board to fall.

When Payne observed this platform on his way up to the top of the shaft he warned the lift engineers' workmen to be careful of the trap-ends, but it was not suggested that the plaintiff could have heard his warning. Payne went on upwards and began to lower a ladder through the manhole at the top of the lift shaft. Meanwhile the plaintiff had reached the first floor and was talking to the workmen. As Payne lowered the ladder the plaintiff was waiting below, and Payne saw him begin to step on-to the working platform erected by the lift engineers' workmen. Payne expected that the latter would have warned anyone on the first floor not to step onto the platform without first ensuring that he was stepping on the left side. The plaintiff himself thought that the platform had been constructed by Payne, in whose competence as a scaffolder he placed complete trust. The first board upon which the plaintiff trod had a trap-end and it toppled up immediately. In an endeavour to regain his balance the plaintiff was forced to take a step forward, but in doing so he placed his foot on one or more of the other three trap-ends. He fell a distance of 18 feet and sustained severe injuries.

The plaintiff brought this action claiming damages for personal injuries against the first and second defendants on the ground of negligence and breaches of regulations 4, 5, 6, 7 (1) and (2), 9, 21 (in relation to the first defendants alone), 22 (a), 23 (2) and 24 of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948.

H. Edmund Davies Q.C., W. D. T. Hodgson and P. L. W. Owen for the first defendants.

H. V. Lloyd-Jones Q.C. and R. Geraint Rees for the second defendants.

The following cases, not referred to in the judgment, were cited in argument: Sexton v. Scaffolding (Great Britain) Ltd.[1]; Hartley v. Mayoh & Co.[2]; Hughes v. McGoff and Vickers Ltd.[3]

Barry J. This is a claim for damages for most grievous personal injuries which were suffered by the plaintiff as a result of an accident which took place on May 4, 1954. On that date the plaintiff was employed by the first defendants as a foreman bricklayer at a new building which these defendants were constructing at Wallasey. This building was designed to contain a lift, for the erection and installation of which the second defendants were responsible under a contract made between them and the first defendants. On the day of the accident the plaintiff stepped upon a highly dangerous working platform which had been erected in the lift shaft of the building at the first floor level and fell over 18 ft. into the well of the shaft. As a result of his fall he sustained injuries, which unfortunately must inevitably cause him to be a hopeless invalid for the remainder of his life.

The plaintiff's case is that his fall and the injuries which resulted from it were caused by breaches of statutory duty or negligence on the part of both or alternatively one or other of the two defendants.

[His Lordship then stated the facts and continued:] When one considers the very stringent statutory regulations concerning the erection and construction of all forms of scaffolding, this is clearly an accident which never should have happened. No one suggests that the plaintiff was in any way responsible for this defective platform, and it would certainly require a very bold advocate to suggest that he was wholly responsible for the disaster which befell him. Indeed, no such suggestion has been made.

On behalf of the first defendants, Mr. Edmund Davies, with great candour, has said that he cannot seek to escape all responsibility on the part of his clients. Mr. Lloyd-Jones, on the other hand, contends that, whatever may be the first defendants' position, no part of the blame for what occurred rests upon the second defendants, although their men did in fact erect a platform in such a way as to infringe almost every relevant provision of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948.

I need not occupy time in considering in any detail the regulations, which were clearly broken. The plaintiff relies on breaches of regulations 4, 5, 6, 7 (1) and (2), 9, 22 (a), regulation 21 in relation to the first defendants alone, and regulations 23 (2) and 24. The latter regulation is immaterial in so far as the present case is concerned, although no doubt it also was infringed. I am not satisfied either that, in the circumstances of this case, regulation 21 has any real application even as against the first defendants. However, no one has contended that this platform complied with any of these regulations, and the only real question is whether the regulations applied to the operation. That, of course, depends on whether the work that was going on on the day of the accident, or that part of it which was being undertaken by the second defendants' men, can be described as a "building operation." This point has not been argued at length by Mr. Edmund Davies. No doubt he adopted in spirit at least the argument that was submitted to me by Mr. Lloyd-Jones as to the inapplicability of the regulations as a whole to anything that was going on in this particular building on the day in question.

If the regulations do apply, it is quite clear that the first defendants, as the plaintiff's employers, are responsible to him in damages for the undoubted breach of those regulations which have been established. The first defendants are also clearly liable to the plaintiff in respect of what I am bound to find was the negligence of their otherwise extremely careful and competent scaffolder, Payne.

Simmons v. Bovis Ltd.

Payne placed too great a reliance upon his hope that the second defendants' workmen would prevent anyone stepping onto this platform, and I am afraid he took an unjustifiable risk in carrying out the work in this way. He could have moved the proper scaffold boards from the top of the building to construct a proper working platform at the first floor level, but he decided to lower the ladder onto this temporary and unsafe structure erected by the second defendants' men before he did so. That was a grave error of judgment, because he ought to have anticipated that some other employee of the first defendants might step onto that platform while the ladder was being lowered, and, in particular, knowing that the plaintiff was assisting in placing the ladder in the lift shaft, he ought to have been aware that the plaintiff was on the first floor—as I think he was—awaiting the ladder, and might at any moment step onto the platform to receive it. What he should have done was to postpone the lowering of the ladder until he had provided a safe working platform at the first floor level. No one suggests any moral blame on his part. He was doing what he thought was his best, and he was trying to kill two birds with one stone, to lower the ladder, and then, while he was up there, collect the scaffold boards and erect a safe platform after the ladder had been lowered. If he had exercised proper care and had envisaged, as a reasonably careful person ought to have done, the prospect of anyone, in the lowering of the ladder, stepping on the platform, then I am sure that he would have adopted a different method of carrying out the work, and this accident would have been avoided.

In those circumstances I am satisfied that there was negligence on the part of this otherwise extremely careful scaffolder, and for that negligence the first defendants are quite clearly responsible. Therefore, on two grounds, on the ground of the breach of the Building Regulations, if they be applicable to this work, and on account of their vicarious liability for Payne's negligence, it is clear in my mind, as Mr. Edmund Davies admitted, that the first defendants are, in part at least, responsible for this disaster.

I now turn to the submissions of the second defendants made with great ability by Mr. Lloyd-Jones. He says that the Building Regulations were in no way applicable to his clients while they were carrying on the work of erecting this lift, and he further submits that there was no negligence of any kind on the part of either of their workmen.

The submission that the Building Regulations were inapplicable to the work which his clients were undertaking in this building was based upon a number of separate grounds. Under regulation 4 the duty of complying with the regulations is only imposed upon contractors or employers of workmen who are undertaking any of the operations to which these regulations apply. Regulation 2, insofar as it is relevant to the present case, provides that the regulations shall apply to the construction or structional alteration of a building.

Mr. Lloyd-Jones' first submission is that the installation of a lift does not form part of the construction or structional alteration of a building. He contends that, even if it can be said that his clients were erecting the lift and installing it on this particular day, none the less at most what they were engaged on was the installation of plant in this building, and that they were not engaged in any building operation. He referred me to certain authorities on this point, and in particular to Elms v. Foster Wheeler Ltd.[1] I do not propose to read at any length the judgments in that case. What emerges from them is that the mere fact that an operation can, in one sense, be properly and accurately described as the installation of plant does not necessarily prevent it from being a part of a building operation. I refer in particular to a very short passage in the judgment of Somervell L.J., where he says[2]: "Leading counsel for the "defendants based his argument on a contrast between installa- "tion of plant and construction of a building. That was not "based on any words in the Regulations or in any Act of Parlia- "ment and I do not myself find it a helpful or satisfactory "contrast, because I think that the installation of plant may "involve the operation of the construction of a building." He went on to refer to the manner in which it had been put by the judge in the court below, and expressed his approval of the way in which he had described the law. Summarizing the judgment of Romer L.J., as I understand it, he considered that the appropriate test is whether a building was being constructed, and, if so, whether the defendants were contributing to its construction.

There is no hard and fast line in cases of this kind. The facts of each particular case must be considered on their own merits. Here certain considerations bear strongly in favour of the view that the second defendants were engaged in the construction of a building. It is quite clear that a building was being constructed at the time when they began their work. The first defendants' men, bricklayers and others, were still at work, and the building was by no means complete. Secondly, the building was designed and constructed in such a way as to enable a lift to be provided, and it was clearly an essential part of this building as designed that a lift should be installed. The lift was an integral part of the building, or certainly the lift runners were an integral part of the building just as much as were the walls of the lift shaft. For those runners to be attached to the wall, the wall had to be altered in that holes had to be bored into it in order to enable the runners to be bolted, and I am satisfied that the persons engaged in the attachment of the runners to the wall were as much engaged upon a building operation and the construction of a building as the bricklayers who were responsible for the laying of the bricks which formed the walls of the shaft itself.

By Romer L.J.'s test in Elms v. Foster Wheeler Ltd.[3] I think the finding clearly is, on the facts of this case, that a building was being constructed and that the second defendants, as lift engineers, were contributing towards its construction.

Mr. Lloyd-Jones has contended that, even though the erection of the lift, or the attachment of the lift runners to the wall of the lift shaft, was a building operation, that operation had not yet been begun on the day when this accident occurred: that all that was being done on that day was the making of chalk marks on the walls of the lift shaft, and that no reasonable person could contend that chalking on a wall was a building operation.

I consider that argument to be unsound. The work must be taken as a whole. It cannot be said that, because on one particular day a workman is not engaged on something which is obviously a building operation, that prevents the regulations from applying to the work as a whole. Here the second defendants had undoubtedly started to carry out their contract to instal a lift in this building. The placing of the chalk marks upon the walls of the lift shaft necessitated the use of ladders and scaffolding, and I am satisfied that, once this work of erection had started, the regulations applied and they applied throughout the work including its inception, which was the marking of the walls or the tapping of the walls for the runners.

Mr. Lloyd-Jones submitted that, even if the regulations apply to this operation, as I have held them to do, neither subsection (1) nor subsection (2) of regulation 4 have any application to his clients. Subsection (1) requires contractors and employers of workmen who are undertaking any of the operations to which these regulations apply to comply with the requirements of certain regulations, including all those regulations relied on by the plaintiff in the present case, as they affect any workman employed by them. The plaintiff was not employed by the second defendants, and although Mr. Elwyn Jones sought, I think, to keep the point open, I am not satisfied that any cause of action against the second defendants can be founded upon this part of the regulation. Similarly, regulation 4 (2) has no application, as none of the regulations there referred to are relied upon by the plaintiff in the present action.

Therefore, I must turn to the second portion of regulation 4, which begins with the words: "and it shall be the duty of every "contractor and employer of workmen who erects or alters any "scaffold to comply with such of the requirements of Regulations "5–30 as relate to the erection or alteration of scaffolds having " regard to the purpose or purposes for which the scaffold is " designed at the time of erection or alteration; . . ."

As I understood the argument, Mr. Lloyd-Jones submitted that this portion of regulation 4 applies only to subcontractors or employers of workmen whose work entails the erection of scaffolding. That means, I assume, an employer who is under some contractual duty to a head contractor or building owner to perform certain work in respect of which he is under an obligation to erect the necessary scaffolding. It has been pointed out that in the present case the second defendants did not, under their contract with the first defendants, undertake any responsibility for the scaffolding required for installing and erecting the lift. The first defendants under their contract, as I understand it, were required to provide all the necessary scaffolding for that purpose. Therefore, said Mr. Lloyd-Jones, these provisions have no application to the second defendants.

I am not satisfied that that is the true position. The second defendants' employees did erect scaffolding on this occasion, and they erected it in the course of their employment with the second defendants. I am not satisfied that they acted in any way improperly in so doing. The fault lay in the working platform, which infringed almost every known building regulation. If their employers had been asked by them: " Shall we stand about " until the first defendants' men have got everything ready for " us, or shall we do all we can to get on with our work with the " least possible delay," I have little doubt as to what the answer would have been. They acted perfectly properly in getting on as quickly as they could with their work, and for that purpose using the planks which were available to provide a platform from which their work could be carried out. The fact that the employers were not under a contractual obligation to provide that platform seems to me to be immaterial. I find that, through their workmen, the second defendants did erect or alter a scaffold in this building. The second part of this regulation was designed to ensure that no one, whether under a contractual obligation to do so or not, shall erect a scaffold in any building under construction which does not comply with these regulations; in other words, to ensure that there shall be no unsafe scaffolding in any building which is being constructed.

The second defendants having through their workmen erected this working platform which is a part of the scaffolding in the building and falls within the regulations concerning scaffolding in the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, are in those circumstances bound by the provisions of the regulations and liable to anyone employed on the premises, whether by them or not, for any damage which may arise through a breach of the regulations with which they are bound to comply.

One final point on this aspect of the case was made by Mr. Lloyd-Jones, which I am bound to say did not seem to me to be quite so formidable as some of his other arguments. He suggested that, even if every other point were found against him, for some reason which I found it difficult to appreciate, his clients' workmen were not erecting or altering scaffolding, they were only engaged on what he called "a temporary placing of a "few planks in a position to serve an immediate purpose." The distinction between that operation and the erecting or alteration of a scaffold I am bound to say escapes me. I think that the regulations apply, however temporary and however fortuitous the erection of the scaffolding may be. They were erecting a working platform on which these defendants' men themselves actually worked before this accident happened, and having been in breach of the regulations through their workmen, I think that the second defendants are bound by the regulations and must pay damages if those regulations are infringed.

Simmons v. Bovis Ltd.

Barry J.

[After finding in addition that the second defendants were liable to the plaintiff at common law for the negligence of their workmen, and after assessing the plaintiff's own contributory negligence at 10 per cent., his Lordship continued:] I now turn to the question of damages, and on that question I shall say very little. It is not necessary for me to dwell upon the severity of these injuries, on the gross and almost total lack of all the amenities of life which result from them, and the humiliation and difficulties with which a man in the plaintiff's position is faced in view of his inability to control his natural functions.

In this case the plaintiff was earning an extremely high wage. If he had remained uninjured his present rate of pay would have amounted to £15 10s. 2d. per week, but I have to take income tax into account, and for that reason his net present earnings would have been reduced by approximately 15s. per week. None the less, £14 15s. net is a very substantial wage, and a larger wage than those which have been earned by a number of unfortunate plaintiffs in cases of this kind. On the other hand, I have to remember that, when the accident happened, the plaintiff was 46, and did have the enjoyment of 10 or 11 years of healthy existence between the mid-thirties and the mid-forties, an important period in the life of any man, which in many other cases has been destroyed on account of an accident of this kind. Owing to his age being greater than that of the plaintiff in Smith v. Alexander Findley & Co. Ltd.,[4] his prospects of continuing working life were, of course, somewhat less than those of the plaintiff in that case. Furthermore, he has considerably fewer years in which to endure the very many afflictions which have now fallen upon him. He has the sort of earning capacity which any person confined to a wheelchair and requiring special lavatory facilities might be said to have. Some sympathetic employer may be found to employ him in the manufacture of small articles with his hands, but from the point of view of the open labour market, his earning capacity is almost non-existent. One hopes that, being a man of great courage, he will find some occupation which will provide him with some measure of happiness and earning capacity during the coming years, but one cannot be at all optimistic in that respect.

SIMMONS v. BOVIS LTD.

Barry J.

This is a case which obviously warrants the award of heavy damages, but in view of all the circumstances I am bound to make them substantially lighter than the award in the case to which I have referred. I think I shall award here the sum of £15,000 by way of general damages, to which has to be added the sum of £557 8s., which I understand is the net amount of special damage, after making all proper allowances, agreed between the parties. There must be a deduction of 10 per cent. from that figure. There will be judgment for £14,002 against both defendants, and, as I have been told there is an agreement between the two defendants as to the contribution of each, I need say nothing further about that.

Judgment for the plaintiff against the first and second defendants.

A grouping notice having been given by a company under section 22 of the Finance Act, 1937, it paid £209,437 profits tax in respect of its own profits and those of a subsidiary, But for the notice its own liability would have been £131,742. The companies having jointly elected to take advantage of section 38 (3) (b) of the Finance Act, 1947, the subsidiary paid the principal company £191,420 "by way of reimbursement of profits tax" as being the amount "which by virtue of the notice having been given is pay-"able by that company."

Held, that the amount which the subsidiary could deduct for the purpose of assessment to income tax being that sum of profits tax which was payable by the principal company by virtue of the grouping notice having been given, it was the amount which was attributable solely to the giving of the notice and which would not have been payable by the principal company if the notice had not been given, viz., £77,695, the difference between what it actually paid and its own liability apart from the grouping notice.

Decision of the Court of Appeal [1955] 1 W.L.R. 277; [1955] 1 All E.R. 633 affirmed.

Appeal from the Court of Appeal (Evershed M.R., Jenkins and Morris L.JJ.).

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal made on February 18, 1955, allowing an appeal by the respondent, F. A. Gahan (Inspector of Taxes), from an order of the High Court (Upjohn J.) dated October 22, 1954. By the order of the High Court an appeal by the respondent on a case stated by the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts was dismissed. The effect of the order of the Court of Appeal was to reverse the determination of the Commissioners. The appeal arose on three assessments to income tax made on Chloride Batteries Ltd., the appellant company, for the years 1949–1950, 1950–1951 and 1951–1952 under Case I of Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918, in respect of the profits arising from its trade.

The facts are stated in the opinion of Viscount Simonds.

Sir Andrew Clark Q.C., F. Heyworth Talbot Q.C. and H. Major Allen for the appellant company.

Sir James Tucker Q.C., Sir Reginald Hills and E. B. Stamp for the respondent.

No cases were cited in argument.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

March 26. Viscount Simonds. My Lords, the appellant company is a subsidiary of another company called Chloride Electrical Storage Co. Ltd., which I will refer to as "the principal "company." For the purpose of the Acts, which I must examine, a company is the subsidiary of another company if the latter holds 25 per cent. or more of its shares. But in fact the principal company held all the shares of the appellant company.

The appeal arises upon three assessments to income tax made upon the appellant company for the years 1949–1950, 1950–1951 and 1951–1952 under Case I of Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918, in respect of the profits arising from its trade.

The matter in dispute is whether a payment of £191,420 made by the appellant company to the principal company was a deductible outgoing in computing the profits of the appellant company for the purpose of income tax, or whether only £77,695 of that amount was so deductible. The answer to this question depends on the true construction of a very few words in the Finance Act, 1947, but it is necessary first to look at the Finance

"by way of profits tax if the notice dealt with under section 22 of the Act of 1947 had not been given.

Section 38 of the Act of 1947, to which I now refer, is the material section. The . . ."

Act, 1937, by which profits tax (then called "national defence contribution") was first imposed.

This tax, which I will continue to call profits tax, was, by section 19 of the Finance Act, 1937, imposed on the profits arising in each accounting period from the trades or businesses therein described. During the relevant chargeable accounting period the appellant and the principal company each carried on a trade falling within the charging provisions and each had profits arising from its trade. This enabled them to take advantage of the provision to which I now refer.

By section 22 of the Act it was enacted as follows: "(1) Where "a body corporate resident in the United Kingdom is a subsidiary "of another body corporate so resident (hereafter in this section "referred to as 'the principal company') the principal company "may, by notice in writing given to the Commissioners of Inland "Revenue before the expiration of any chargeable accounting "period of the subsidiary or within two months thereafter, "require that the provisions of subsection (2) of this section "shall apply to the subsidiary as respects that period and all "subsequent chargeable accounting periods throughout which it "continues to be a subsidiary of the principal company: . . . "(2) Where such a notice is given, the profits or losses arising "in any chargeable accounting period to which the notice relates "from the trade or business carried on by the subsidiary shall "be treated, for the purpose of the provisions of this Act relating "to the national defence contribution . . . as if they were profits "or losses arising in the corresponding chargeable accounting "period from the trade or business carried on by the principal "company. . . ."

By section 25 (1) of the same Act it was provided that the amount of profits tax payable in respect of the profits arising from a trade or business in a chargeable accounting period should be allowed to be deducted as an expense in computing for the purpose of income tax the profits and gains arising from that trade or business in that period.

The Finance Act, 1947, introduced important changes into the law. With one of them, a change of great practical importance, by which the rate of tax was made to vary according to whether profits were or were not distributed by way of dividend, your Lordships are not concerned. I mention it only to explain that the sum of £191,420, which I mentioned at the beginning of this speech, is the sum which the appellant company would have paid by way of profits tax if the notice dealt with under section 38 to which I now refer had not been given.

Section 38 of the Act of 1947 is the material section. The relevant parts of it are as follows: "(1) Where a notice under "subsection (1) of section 22 of the Finance Act, 1937 (which "relates to subsidiary companies) is in force . . . (3) Where— "(a) such a notice as aforesaid is in force; and (b) the subsidiary "to which the notice relates pays to the principal company an

"amount by way of reimbursement of profits tax which by virtue "of the notice having been given is payable by that company "for any chargeable accounting period ending after December 31, "1946; and (c) the principal company and the subsidiary jointly "so elect by notice in writing given to the Commissioners of "Inland Revenue within six months from the end of that "chargeable accounting period or such longer time as those Com- "missioners may in any case allow, the amount so paid, and any "amount so paid in relation to a subsequent chargeable account- "ing period, by the subsidiary to the principal company shall for "all the purposes of the Income Tax Acts be treated—(i) as "regards the subsidiary, as an amount of profits tax payable in "respect of its profits arising in the chargeable accounting period "of the subsidiary corresponding to the chargeable accounting "period to which the payment relates; and (ii) as regards the "principal company, as reducing the amount of the profits tax "payable by the principal company for the chargeable accounting "period to which the payment relates. . . . (6) This section "shall be construed as one with the said section 22."

I have italicised the important words upon whose construction the issue depends. But before considering them I will state the material facts which are undisputed.

The appellant company commenced business on January 1, 1950, as a manufacturer of storage batteries and made up its first accounts to December 30, 1950, which thus constituted or included the basis period for the years of assessment under appeal. The principal company duly gave notice pursuant to section 22 (1) of the 1937 Act requiring that subsection (2) of that section should apply to the appellant company. Therefore, profits tax became payable by the principal company in respect of its own and the appellant company's profits. This tax was assessed at £209,437 12s. 0d. If the notice had not been given, the principal company would have had to pay the sum of £131,742 8s. 0d. by way of tax on its own profits only, a difference of £77,695 4s. 0d. Taking advantage of section 38 (3) (b), which I have set out, and purporting to do so by way of reimbursement as therein mentioned, the appellant company paid to the principal company the sum of £191,420 (that sum being calculated in the way I have already described), and then under section 39 (3) (c) the principal company and the appellant company jointly elected that the sum should, for all the purposes of the Income Tax Acts, be treated as provided for in paragraphs (i) and (ii) of subsection (3) of section 38, or, in other words, that as regards the appellant company it should be treated as the amount of profits tax payable in respect of the profits arising in the chargeable accounting period of twelve months to December 31, 1950. The Revenue authorities did not accept the view that £191,420 or any larger sum than £77,695 could be reimbursed to the principal company by the appellant company and assessed the latter company to income tax accordingly. From these assessments the appellant company appealed to the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts, who allowed their appeal. From their determination the respondent, the Inspector of Taxes, appealed by way of case stated to the High Court, Upjohn J., who upheld their determination. From his order the respondent appealed to the Court of Appeal, which allowed the appeal. From their order the appellant company brings this appeal.

I state again the short question in this case. What is the meaning of the words " an amount by way of reimbursement of " profits tax which by virtue of the notice having been given is " payable by that company " where they occur in section 38 (3) (b) of the Act?

The notice to which reference is made is the notice given under section 22 of the Act of 1937, and I do not dissent from the contention of the appellant company that the effect of that notice was to create a single liability in the principal company in respect of profits tax. It was a single liability computed on the aggregate of its own and the appellant company's profits. Nor would I dispute that in the judgments of the Master of the Rolls and Jenkins L.J. there are to be found expressions which suggest that after the notice the principal company became subject to two separate liabilities, the one in respect of its own profits, the other an additional one in respect of the appellant company's profits. But these are, I think, verbal criticisms only and do not affect the substance of their reasoning, with which I find myself in complete agreement.

The structure of section 38 (3) is not to be disregarded. It does not purport to authorize any payment by a subsidiary to a principal company. But it provides that, where certain conditions are satisfied, including a payment by a subsidiary to a principal company, then certain results for tax purposes shall follow. It assumes that such a payment is authorized by the general law. This throws some light upon the construction of the vital words; for a subsidiary company may have as many as 25 per cent. minority shareholders and it may have trade and other creditors. I do not understand how, under the general law, a subsidiary could by way of reimbursement pay to a principal company a sum which it, the subsidiary, was never liable to pay. Learned counsel urged that it was purely a domestic arrangement between the two companies how much one should pay the other, but this argument ignores the position of minority shareholders and creditors and it ignores, too, the salient fact that, while the payment may be a domestic arrangement, the purpose of the section is to give to that payment certain consequences for tax purposes. It is with this background that the material words must be considered.

It is possible, too, that some light may be thrown on the problem by the use of the word " reimbursement." It suggests to me, as it did to Morris L.J., that the sum paid by the subsidiary company was one for which the principal company would not, but for the notice, have become liable. This consideration leads me at once to the ground upon which, in effect, the Court of Appeal decided against the appellant company. "What profits tax," they ask,[1] "can answer the description of "being payable by the principal company by virtue of the "notice?" I take the answer of Jenkins L.J.: "Surely only "such profits tax as is payable by the principal company by "reason of the notice having been given, and which would not "have been payable by the principal company if the notice had "not been given." This he describes as "the natural and "inescapable meaning of the language used." I agree with him.

The principal company paid £209,437 12s. 0d. profits tax in respect of the relevant accounting period. Notice or no notice, it incurred a liability to pay profits tax under section 19 of the Act of 1937. If there had been no notice, its liability would have been £131,742 8s. 0d. As a result of the notice its liability was £209,437 12s. 0d. What amount of profits tax became payable "by virtue of the notice"? No other sum than the difference between those amounts, namely, £77,695 4s. 0d. Even here there is in the last analysis a misstatement. For it is not by virtue of any notice that liability to tax arises. The liability arises under the Act. But the quantum of liability both as between the subsidiary and principal company and as between the companies and the Revenue authorities may be affected by the notice. It is therefore legitimate, though not entirely accurate, to speak of profits tax "which by virtue of the notice having been given is payable." It is at least true that, quoad the profits of the subsidiary company, the liability of the principal company arises from section 19 of the Act of 1937 combined with the notice under section 22. It would be untrue to speak of the liability of the principal company in respect of its own profits as arising from a notice. That liability arose under the Act alone, though the quantum might be affected by a notice. It would be increased if the subsidiary company made a profit or reduced if it made a loss. This latter possibility may throw some light on the relevant words. For it would, as it appears to me, be plain nonsense to speak of the subsidiary company paying an amount by way of reimbursement of profits tax which by virtue of the notice having been given is payable by the principal company, when the only result of the notice was to reduce the amount of tax so payable.

For these reasons, which are intended only to supplement those of the Court of Appeal, with which, as I have said, I am in full agreement, I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Lord Reid. My Lords, I agree.

what has fallen from my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack. I, too, think that the decision of the Court of Appeal was correct. The point is a very short one and it does not need elaboration from me.

I would like to make it plain, however, that I do not regard a construction of section 38 (3) of the Finance Act, 1947, which limits the appellant company's deduction for income tax purposes to £77,695 as a construction which introduces into subsection (3) (b) any words not already there. On the contrary, I think that this construction offers the only tenable meaning of the words used.

Even though the tax enactments in question relate to "group" assessments and to inter-company transfers of money from a subsidiary (though not necessarily a wholly owned subsidiary) to a principal company, the payment by the subsidiary which we are supposed to envisage cannot just be a transfer to the principal of as much cash as it may need to make good whatever it has had to pay in satisfaction of its own liability for profits tax as a whole. It must be a payment to the principal of some amount which the giving of the notice under section 22 (1) of the Finance Act, 1937, has made it reasonable and fair that the one company should pay over to the other. Against this background the words "reimbursement" and "by virtue of the notice" acquire an obvious significance, and, in my opinion, they limit the ranking amount to such an amount as that by which the profits tax bill of the principal company has been increased in consequence of the notice.

LORD SOMERVELL OF HARROW. My Lords, I agree with the opinion delivered by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack, and have nothing I wish to add to it.

By a settlement made in 1929 a settlor, who died in 1952, directed his trustees to stand possessed of the settled property on trust during his lifetime to pay the income of the trust fund equally to his two daughters so long as they both remained alive and unmarried, but so that the amount paid to each daughter was not to exceed £250 in any year, or if one of them died or married, the income payable to the other should not exceed £410 in any year. Subject to this trust the income of the surplus of the fund was to be paid equally between the surviving children of the settlor. After the death of the settlor the trustees were directed to appropriate, in respect of such of the daughters as should then be unmarried, a fund sufficient at that time to produce an annuity of £250 each year for her life, to be paid so long as she continued unmarried. The trustees were empowered to resort to the capital of the appropriated fund to make good any deficiency of the annual income of that fund. Subject to those trusts, the capital and income of the trust fund, including any surplus income of the appropriated fund, was to be held on trust for such of the settlor's children as should survive him and if more than one in equal shares absolutely.

All the four children of the settlor survived him and both the daughters had remained unmarried. The Crown claimed estate duty under section 2 (1) (d) of the Finance Act, 1894, first in respect of the annuities which became payable to the daughters out of the appropriated funds on the death and, second in respect of the corpus of the settled property to which the four children of the settlor became absolutely entitled at his death:—

Held, that duty was payable under section 2 (1) (d) in respect of the absolute interest taken by the four children in the corpus of the settled property at the death of the settlor for that interest was distinct and different in kind and quality from their right to share in surplus income during the settlor's lifetime and the beneficial enjoyment of that absolute interest was contingent on surviving the settlor.

(2) That, as regards the daughters' annuities, duty was not payable under the section. On the death of the settlor, assuming that at all material times the income of the trust fund could be treated as having amounted to not less than £250, there was no significant change in the beneficial enjoyment of the sum payable to each daughter, which before as well as after the death was to be taken in priority to all other interests. After the death of the settlor there was a right to have recourse to capital if the income in any year was insufficient, but that change only concerned the security for the annuities and not their amount or duration. It could not be said that on the death of the settlor each daughter became for the first time entitled to a new and different beneficial right.

D'Avigdor-Goldsmid v. Inland Revenue Commissioners [1953] A.C. 347; [1953] 2 W.L.R. 372; [1953] 1 All E.R. 403 applied.

Decision of Danckwerts J. varied.

APPEAL from Danckwerts J.

The following statement of the facts is taken substantially from the judgment of Lord Evershed M.R.

On January 4, 1929, Ebenezer Thomas Parkes, hereafter called "the settlor," made a settlement in favour of his four children, two sons and two daughters. Having transferred certain freehold property and investments to his trustees by a conveyance of even date, the settlor assigned to them a policy of insurance on his life. By clause 3 of the settlement, during the lifetime of the settlor, or until the earlier receipt of the policy moneys (including moneys received in respect of any policy or policies issued in substitution for the original policy), the trustees were to stand possessed of the income of the premises settled and the investments for the time being representing the same upon trust: (1) to pay the same unto and equally between the settlor's two daughters "so long as they shall remain unmarried and after the "death or marriage of either of them then to the other so long "as she shall remain unmarried but so that the income so to be "paid to each or either of the said daughters under this pro-"vision shall not exceed £250 in any year during which they "shall both be alive and unmarried or in case either of them shall "have died or married then the income so payable to the other "shall not exceed £410; (2) subject to the trust aforesaid, to pay "the said income or the surplus arising in each year of the trust "unto and equally between . . . " the four children of the settlor, "or such of them as shall from time to time be living."

By clause 4 it was provided that, on the death of the settlor, or the earlier receipt of the policy moneys, (1) the trustees should appropriate and retain out of the trust fund "in respect of each "or such of the before-mentioned daughters of the settlor who "shall then be unmarried a fund sufficient at the time of appro-"priation to produce out of the annual income thereof an annuity "of £250 which annuity shall be paid by the trustees to each "such daughter respectively during her life and so long as she "shall continue unmarried and so that if the income of the "funds or fund so appropriated shall at any time prove insuffi-"cient for payment in full of the annuities or annuity so payable "thereout respectively resort may be had to the capital thereof "from time to time to make good such deficiency but the surplus "income (if any) of the said appropriated funds or fund from "time to time remaining after the payment of the said annuities "or annuity shall be applicable as income of the remainder of the "trust fund; (2) as and when the said annuities or annuity shall "cease the funds or fund appropriated in respect thereof shall "revert to and become subject to the trusts hereinafter declared "concerning the trust fund; (3) subject to the trusts aforesaid "the trustees shall stand possessed of the capital and future "income of the trust fund upon trust for such one or more "of . . . " the four children of the settlor "as shall be living "at the death of the settlor and if more than one in equal shares "absolutely."

By clause 5 each of the daughters covenanted with the settlor and separately with the trustees that so long as they should both remain unmarried they would pay in equal shares between them, and on the death or marriage of either of them the other so long as she should continue unmarried would pay the whole of the premiums on the settled life policies as they became due, and they also charged the income payable to them under clause 3 (1), that is, their prior right to income up to the maximum of £250 each, with payment by them of the premiums.

Clause 10 was expressed to empower the settlor to bring further life policies on his own life into the settlement, on the terms (1) that, if he did so, the rights of the daughters under clause 3 (1) to the first £500 between them of the income of the settlement should be increased by the amount of the premiums on the additional policies brought into the settlement; and (2) that the covenants on the daughters' part for payment of premiums and the charges on their priority income rights should extend also so as to be applicable to the premiums on the additional policies.

By the terms of certain later memoranda and deeds, the income of the daughters was wholly released from the charges above mentioned. The settlor did in fact bring into settlement further policies, and the daughters' priority income rights were augmented accordingly. The daughters remained liable to pay all the premiums on all the settled policies under their covenants to that effect, and they paid all such premiums down to the date of the settlor's death.

During the lifetime of the settlor the income of the settled property barely sufficed to provide for the daughters' income rights, and during the whole of that period the total of the surplus income divisible among all four of the settlor's children amounted to no more than about £77.

The settlor died on February 13, 1952, and all his four children survived him though one of the sons had since died. Both daughters remained unmarried.

It was contended by the Crown that estate duty under section 2 (1) (d) of the Finance Act, 1894,[1] became exigible on the death of the settlor (a) in respect of the annuities, so expressly described, payable to the two daughters under clause 4 (1) of the settlement, and (b) in respect of the shares of corpus of the settled property to which the four children of the settlor, all having survived him, became absolutely entitled by virtue of clause 4 (3) of the settlement; the annuities in the one case and the absolute interests in possession in the other constituting beneficial interests in the subject-matter of the settlement, which arose to the two daughters and the four children respectively for the first time on the settlor's death, within the meaning of section 2 (1) (d) of the Act.

Danckwerts J. accepted these contentions and decided in favour of the Crown under both heads. The trustees appealed. For the purposes of the appeal it was common ground that the terms of the settlement relevant for consideration were those set out in clauses 2, 3 and 4 of the settlement, and that no question arose on the actual figures or on the daughters' covenants to pay premiums or on the charges on their priority income rights.

John Pennycuick Q.C. and S. M. Young for the trustees.
E. Blanshard Stamp for the Crown.

In addition to the cases referred to in the judgments the following were cited in argument: In re Barbour's Policies of Assurance [2]; Attorney-General v. Lloyds Bank [3]; In re Fuller's Settlement [4]; Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Scott's Trustees [5]; Skinner v. Attorney-General. [6]

LORD EVERSHED M.R. stated the facts and continued: As regards the second of the two heads of claim, I entertain no doubt that the view of Danckwerts J. is correct. It was the submission of Mr. Pennycuick, for the trustees, that the joint effect of clause 3 (2) and clause 4 (3) of the settlement was, as regards the interests thereunder of any one of the settlor's four children, in substance entirely the same as an immediate and absolute gift in favour of A, subject only to the liability of being divested in the event of A not surviving the happening of a particular event, for example, the death of the donor—a kind of gift which in fact, it was said, had never given rise to a claim for duty upon the donor's death. Mr. Pennycuick submitted further that the existence of a right in possession to an aliquot share of surplus income during the settlor's life distinguishes this case from Adamson v. Attorney-General. [1] But whatever the "sub-"stance" of the children's interests might be in the sense in which Mr. Pennycuick used that term, it is to my mind incontrovertible that the legal effect of the settlement was to confer or give rise for the first time on the death of the settlor to an absolute interest in capital in favour of each of the settlor's four children, contingently upon their surviving the event of the settlor's death. Those interests were, to my mind, distinct and different in kind and quality from the rights of the four children to share in surplus income during the life of the settlor.

I, therefore, agree with the view of Danckwerts J. which he expressed as follows: "It seems to me that, as regards the "capital, the interests which the beneficiaries got were interests "which arose only upon the death of the settlor. Until then "they had merely contingent interests in the capital, dependent "upon them surviving his death and it was upon the death of "the settlor that they obtained vested interests in equal shares "in the rest of the capital, and upon that event fresh interests "came into being."

But the question in regard to the daughters' annuities given by clause 4 (1) of the settlement is, to my mind, far more difficult. Mr. Stamp argued with great force that, by parity of the reasoning applied in answering the question of the head of claim relating to capital, the legal effect of the settlement was in this regard to create and give rise for the first time on the settlor's death to two annuities of £250 in favour of the daughters for the remainder of their respective spinsterhoods; and that these interests, being properly speaking "annuities" (as that term is commonly used), are quite distinct and different not only in their incidents but also in kind and in quality from any beneficial interests in the settled property which the daughters had during the settlor's life, particularly from their priority income rights to the extent of £250 each during that period. The daughters' rights to receive the last-mentioned sums of £250 were not, according to Mr. Stamp's argument, in truth annuities as that word should be understood at all. During the settlor's life, said Mr. Stamp, the rights of the daughters were to receive certain shares of the total annual income of the settled property, the fractions varying with the amount of the income received. Put simply, they were each entitled to one half of the first £500 of such income and to one quarter each of the balance (assuming, of course, that both daughters remained unmarried and that both sons continued to live). After the settlor's death, each unmarried daughter would be entitled to get each year £250, no more and no less: before the settlor's death, she would never receive that sum, except in the very improbable event of the income of the settled property being in any year exactly £500. Except in that event, each daughter would in fact receive from the trustees a cheque for a varying sum, either less or greater than £250. According to this argument, it follows that, since the interests of the daughters ceased altogether on the settlor's death and were replaced by the new annuities, the latter fall within the scope of section 2 (1) (d) of the Act.

Notwithstanding the force and attraction of the argument, I have, on the whole, come to the conclusion that it ought to be rejected. I do not, of course, forget that, according to the rule laid down for us by the House of Lords in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Duke of Westminster,[2] it is the duty of the court to determine the question of liability to duty according to the legal effect of the settlement or other transaction which gives rise to the claim. The court is not entitled to decide the question by reference to the substance of the matter, if by that term is meant according to the process of treating the rights created as equivalent to rights of a well-recognized and similar character which would or might have been created in some other or more usual way, and which those responsible are to be presumed to have intended, and by disregarding the true legal effect of the deed or other transaction which is before the court.

On the other hand, the words in the section, "beneficial "interest," ought not to be construed as referring exclusively to the technical forms of conveyancing. (See per Lord Reid in Coutts & Co. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners.[3]) Nor ought the word "annuity" for this purpose to be confined to a beneficial disposition expressly so called or to one having specific incidents, providing for its security. (See the language of Jenkins L.J. in In re Duke of Norfolk.[4])

In the present case, as I think, the legal effect of the settlement was to provide for each unmarried daughter a first right—that is, a right in priority to all other interests created or conferred—to the personal enjoyment of the yearly sum of £250. There was, of course, this difference in the incidents of that right during the settlor's life and after his death. During the former period the yearly sum was payable exclusively out of the income of each year and was supported by no charge on capital and by no continuing charge on income. After the settlor's death the yearly sum was charged on the corpus of a fund specially appropriated for the purpose; but in point of beneficial enjoyment there was no essential difference, in my judgment, before and after the settlor's death. The difference was that of incidents (particularly security) in accordance with the provisions in the settlement which were, in their nature, administrative in kind; that is, directing the appropriation of specific sums to provide and secure the yearly sum to the exoneration of the rest of the settled property.

In my judgment, the fact that, save in the very exceptional case mentioned, the sum paid in any year to each daughter was some sum other than £250 is not significant. In any year in which the income of the settled property exceeded £500, a strict statement accompanying the trustees' cheque would show it to be made up, as to £250, of a sum payable under clause 3 (1) and, as to the balance of one quarter, of a share or surplus income under clause 3 (2).

The case in this respect is not different from that commonly met with, where an annuitant, in the ordinary sense, is also one of the residuary legatees of income. The present case, in my judgment, has to be determined as if the surplus income under clause 3 (2) were divisible among a class of persons which did not include either of the daughters.

PARKES' SETTLEMENT, In re. MIDLAND BANK EXECUTOR AND TRUSTEE CO. LTD. v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

Lord Evershed M.R.

Danckwerts J. accepted the argument of Mr. Stamp. He said: "I must look at the terms of the settlement. What each "of the two sisters had during the lifetime of the settlor was "not, as it seems to me, in truth an annuity at all. They were "entitled to the income of the settled fund in equal shares. "There was a top limit of £250 which would prevent them "getting more than £250 a year so long as they both remained "unmarried, but, in fact, during most of the time what happened "was that the top limit never came into consideration at all "because the fund produced less than £500 a year. There were "some years in which the fund produced more than £500 a "year and then, of course, the top limit would apply. Other-"wise, what they got was simply an annual share in the income "of the trust fund. If one of them married or died, then the "survivor had a different limit." Then there is a reference to what that limit was.

The judge continued: "Now, what happened upon the death "of the deceased? Those arrangements, as it seems to me, "came to an end and instead you find that the trustees are "required to set aside two appropriated funds; each of them "is to be sufficient to produce £250 a year and out of that "£250 a year an annuity in the proper sense of the term "is to be provided in each case for the relevant daughter; "then, subject to that, the whole capital and income of the trust "funds becomes divisible among the four beneficiaries, the four "children of the settlor. Therefore, it seems to me, there comes "into being an interest of quite a different nature from that "which was created during the lifetime of the settlor, to wit, "two definite annuities of £250 with different rights from any-"thing the daughters had before."

With all respect to the judge, I have come to a different conclusion. In my judgment, during the settlor's life each daughter was entitled to receive and was in beneficial enjoyment and possession of a yearly sum of £250 in priority to all other interests, subject only to the limitation that, if the income of the settlement did not extend to £500 altogether, each daughter would pro tanto go short.

I should perhaps state again that I am proceeding throughout on the hypothesis conceded by Mr. Pennycuick and Mr. Stamp before us that we are to judge the matter on the footing that all the relevant provisions of the settlement are those in clauses 3 and 4 and that we are not concerned with actual figures.

The daughters being in beneficial enjoyment of that right, there was, as it seems to me, no change in the beneficial enjoyment and possession such as would give rise to a claim for duty. I agree with Mr. Pennycuick that prima facie there must, in order to give rise to a valid claim for duty, whether under section 1 or under section 2 of the Finance Act, be a change, not merely of source or title, but of possession or enjoyment.

Mr. Stamp conceded that there must be some limits on the full rigour of his argument. Suppose a case where under a settlement an annuity, expressly so called, of £X per annum is given to A during a settlor's life, also expressed to determine on the settlor's death, and thereafter another annuity of exactly similar amount is given to A for the rest of A's life; or suppose an annuity of £X to A charged on income only during the settlor's life and after his death on corpus also, or an annuity charged after the settlor's death on different funds from those funds designated to support the annuity during the settlor's life. In all these cases Mr. Stamp conceded, rightly and inevitably, as I think, that no claim for duty could arise on the settlor's death.

Mr. Stamp was challenged by Mr. Pennycuick to indicate where in such cases the line should be drawn, so that all these cases falling on one side of the line could be recognized as exempt for duty. Mr. Stamp declined to accept the challenge, quite properly and justifiably. We are not here concerned with the attempted formulation of principle or rule of thumb for the determination of all cases of this character, but with the question, aye or no, whether on the facts of this case, on the true interpretation and legal effect of this settlement made on January 4, 1929, duty became exigible on the settlor's death in respect of annuities given to his daughters by clause 4 of the settlement.

Cases of this kind are always difficult (and I have found this case no exception), some on their special facts falling on one and some falling on the other side of the so-called dividing line. There will no doubt be fine distinctions; but, for the reasons that I have tried to state, in the present case I have come to the conclusion that no duty is payable in respect of the daughters' annuities. On this point, therefore, I would allow the appeal; but, on the other point, I think it should be dismissed.

JENKINS L.J. I am of the same opinion. In the course of the hearing before us it was, as I understood it, agreed on both sides that the provisions of the settlement as regards the payment by the daughters of the premiums on the original and additional policies, and the compensating increase of the maximum yearly sum of £250 payable to each daughter under the primary trust of income by the amount of the premiums on the additional policies as and when brought into the settlement, could be ignored; that £250 per annum could be treated as the relevant maximum figure in respect of each daughter; and that one half of each year's income of the trust fund could be treated as having amounted, at all material times during the life of the settlor, to not less than £250.

With the above-mentioned simplifications, the legal effect of the settlement may be thus summarized: (1) During the life of the settlor: (a) each of the two daughters, so long as both were living and unmarried, was entitled to receive year by year out of the income of the trust fund one half of the amount of such income or the sum of £250, whichever should be the less, with no right of recourse to the income of any future year or to the capital trust fund to make good any amount whereby one half of such income for any year might fall short of £250; (b) in the event (which did not in fact happen) of either daughter marrying or dying, her interest in income as above described was to cease and the other daughter was thenceforth until her death or marriage to receive year by year the whole of the income of the trust fund or £410, whichever was the less, with the same absence of recourse to the future income or to capital as in the case of the £250; (c) in the event of the income for any year being more than sufficient to provide for each daughter the sum of £250 or, for the surviving unmarried daughter, the sum of £410, as the case might be, the surplus income for that year was to be divided equally amongst all the four sons and daughters of the settlor or such of them as should for the time being be living.

(2) After the death of the settlor: (a) the trustees were to appropriate out of the trust fund in respect of each daughter, provided she should then be unmarried, a fund sufficient at the time of appropriation to produce out of its income an annuity of £250, which was to be paid to such daughter so long as she should be living and unmarried, and, in the event of the income of such appropriated fund proving at any time insufficient to pay such annuity in full, resort might be had to the capital thereof to make good such deficiency; but any surplus income of such appropriated fund remaining after payment of such annuity was to be applicable as income of the remainder of the trust fund; (b) the trust fund remaining after the appropriation as above of the funds or fund required to provide the annuities or annuity payable to the daughters, or either of them, and also each or any fund so appropriated after the annuity to which it related should have ceased to be payable, were to be held both as to capital and income, in trust absolutely for all the four sons and daughters of the settlor or such of them as should be living at his death and, if more than one, in equal shares.

It thus appears that from the date of the settlement until the death of the settlor each of the daughters was entitled to receive, in respect of each year during her life, or until her marriage, out of the income of the trust fund for such year the sum of £250, or one half of the income of the trust fund for such year, which ever was the less: whereas on the death of the settlor she became entitled during her life or until her marriage to a yearly sum of £250 payable out of the income for each year or, if need be, out of the capital of a part of the trust fund appropriated for the purpose; and that, during the life of the settlor (but not after his death), the yearly sum payable to either of the daughters as above might be increased to £410 or to the whole of the income of the trust fund, whichever might be the less, in the event of the other daughter dying or marrying.

It further appears that, from the date of the settlement until the death of the settlor, the four children, or such of them as should for the time being be living, were entitled in equal shares to any surplus income of the trust fund for any year remaining after payment of the two yearly sums of £250 payable to the two daughters respectively, or the sum of £410 payable to the sole surviving and unmarried daughter, as the case might be, in respect of that year; and each of the four children was further contingently entitled in the event of his or her surviving the settlor to share equally in the capital of the trust fund with the others or other of them so surviving, subject, as regards the funds or fund appropriated to provide the annuities or annuity of £250 payable to both or either of the daughters, to the trusts for payment of such annuities or annuity out of the income or, if need be, the capital thereof; whereas, from and after the death of the settlor, in the events which happened, all four children became entitled, subject as aforesaid, to immediate and absolutely vested interests in the capital and future income of the trust fund in equal shares, including the two funds appropriated to provide the two daughters' annuities as and when those annuities should respectively cease to be payable, and any surplus income arising from those funds in the meantime.

Such being the effect of the settlement, the question in the appeal is whether each or either of the following interests—that is to say, (a) the annuities of £250 each provided for the daughters on the death of the settlor by means of the appropriations directed to be made for that purpose, and (b) the absolute vested interest in one-fourth of the capital and future income of the trust fund (subject, as regards the appropriated funds, to the trusts for payment of the annuities) attained on the death of the settlor by each of his four children—attracted estate duty on the death of the settlor under the provisions of section 2 (1) of the Finance Act, 1894, which, so far as relevant, is in these terms: "Property passing on the death of the deceased shall be "deemed to include the property following, that is to say:— . . . "(d) Any annuity or other interest purchased or provided by the "deceased . . . to the extent of the beneficial interest accruing "or arising . . . on the death of the deceased."

Mr. Pennycuick, for the trustees of the settlement, admits that the investments and, for the purposes of this appeal, the policies comprised in the settlement must be taken to have constituted an "interest" within the meaning of the subsection, though I understand him to reserve this point so far as the policies are concerned for possible argument to the contrary in the event of the matter going higher. On the footing that the settled investments and policies constituted an "interest," it is, of course, plain that they were an interest provided by the deceased. It follows that the interest so provided (that is, the investments and policies) attracted estate duty on the death of the deceased to the extent of any beneficial interest accruing or arising on such death, and the point at issue is whether any beneficial interest did so accrue or arise within the meaning of the subsection.

I agree with the judge that, so far as decided cases are concerned, the whole of the guidance available on this question is to be found in D'Avigdor-Goldsmid v. Inland Revenue Commissioners,[5] and in particular in the passages referred to by him from the speeches of Lords Porter [6] and Reid.[7]

Lord Porter said [8]: "In Adamson's case [9] there was, as the "majority of their Lordships held, a change in the interest of "the beneficiaries: before the death they had a contingent "interest which might have been divested; after it they had a "vested interest. The reasoning is best seen in the observa- "tions of Lord Warrington.[10] He says: 'In the present case "'the interest of each child was unquestionably provided by the "'deceased, and is therefore to be deemed to be included in the "'expression "property passing on the death of the deceased," "'but only to the extent of the beneficial interest accruing or "'arising on the death of the deceased. Before his death each "'child had a beneficial interest, but one that might be "'destroyed either by an exercise of the power of appointment "'or by the death of the child in the lifetime of the deceased: "'on his death without exercising his power the beneficial "'interest of each child became absolute and indefeasible.' "Your Lordships' House so decided in Adamson's case,[11] and "Lord Warrington's words set out the ground upon which the "decision was based. On that reasoning there was as a result "of the death a change in the rights which each child enjoyed. "Until it occurred he might have got all or nothing or some "intermediate sum: afterwards his rights were finally deter- "mined."

Lord Reid said [12]: "In the cases where the Crown has "succeeded it has been because it was held that some right or "property of a different kind from that previously enjoyed by "the beneficiary arose or accrued on the death, or the right of "the beneficiary was in some way enlarged or altered and not "merely because the beneficiary's existing right became more "valuable after the death."

On the death of the deceased in the present case, was there such a change in the rights enjoyed by the two daughters or in the rights enjoyed by all the four children of the deceased as to justify the conclusion that a beneficial interest then accrued or arose within the meaning of the section? First, as to the position of the two daughters; apart from her interest in any surplus income, the rights of each daughter during the life of the settlor did not materially differ from those of the recipient of an annuity of £250 payable as regards each year out of the income of a given fund for that year and not further or otherwise, with no right of recourse to future income or to capital, to make good any deficiency. Such an annuitant, if the designated income for any year exceeded £250, would be entitled to receive out of such income the sum of £250 and no more; and, if the designated income for any year fell short of £250, would be entitled to the whole of such income. It is true that the primary trust of income in favour of the two daughters in the present case is expressed as a trust to divide the income equally between them, with a proviso to the effect that the income payable to each or either of them is not to exceed £250 in any year, but this seems to me to be no more than a somewhat periphrastic method of achieving the same result as if each of them had in form been given a yearly sum of £250 payable as regards each year out of and to the extent of one half of the income of the trust fund for that year and not further or otherwise. Like the annuitant referred to above, each daughter was, when the designated income (that is, as regards each daughter, one half of the income of the trust fund) for any year was equal to or exceeded £250, entitled to receive £250 out of such income; and, apart from the trust for division of any surplus (which I am for the moment ignoring) nothing more. If, on the other hand, the designated income for any year were to fall short of £250, she was, again like the annuitant referred to above, entitled to receive in respect of that year the whole of such income and nothing more. In other words, each daughter was entitled during the life of the settlor, so long as she was living and unmarried, to receive in respect of each year a sum of £250 out of the designated income for each year or the whole of such designated income, whichever was the less; and I think I was accurate in so describing her position earlier in this judgment.

If I am right so far, then it seems to me to follow that each daughter is to be regarded as entitled, as from the date of the settlement and before as well as after the settlor's death, to receive during her life or until her marriage the yearly sum of £250, payable as regards each year during the settlor's life out of and to the extent of one half of the income of the trust fund for that year, with no right of recourse to future income or to capital to make good any deficiency, and payable as regards each year after the settlor's death out of the income of a part of the trust fund appropriated for the purpose, with a right of recourse to the capital of the appropriated fund to make good any deficiency in such income.

If the rights of each daughter under the primary trust of income are accurately thus described, it follows that the only changes in the character of her interest on the settlor's death were (1) that the possibility of her yearly payment being increased to £410 or the whole of the income of the trust fund, whichever might be the less, through the death or marriage of her sister, came to an end, which, as it seems to me, is wholly immaterial; and (2) that her yearly sum of £250, instead of being payable as regards each year only out of and to the extent of one half of the income of the trust fund for such year, was thenceforth provided for by the income of a fund appropriated for the purpose, with a right of recourse to capital to make good any deficiencies in such income.

In deciding this part of the case in favour of the Crown, the judge expressed his reasons thus: "I must look at the terms of "the settlement. What each of the two sisters had during the "lifetime of the settlor was not, as it seems to me, in truth an "annuity at all. They were entitled to the income of the settled "fund in equal shares. There was a top limit of £250 which "would prevent them getting more than £250 a year so long as "they both remained unmarried, but, in fact, during most of "the time what happened was that the top limit never came "into consideration at all because the fund produced less than "£500 a year. There were some years in which the fund produced "more than £500 a year and then, of course, the top limit would "apply. Otherwise, what they got was simply an annual share "in the income of the trust fund. If one of them married or "died then the survivor had a different limit. She then, of "course, received the whole income of the trust fund, but the "limit in her case was not twice £250 but was £410 a year; and "subject to those payments to be made to the two daughters, "then the four children were to receive the surplus income, if "there was any surplus income, after providing for the daughters' "rights, in equal shares. Now, what happened upon the death "of the deceased? Those arrangements, as it seems to me, "came to an end, and instead you find that the trustees are "required to set aside two appropriated funds; each of them "is to be sufficient to produce £250 a year and out of that £250 "a year an annuity in the proper sense of the term is to be "provided in each case for the relevant daughter; then, subject "to that, the whole capital and income of the trust funds becomes "divisible among the four beneficiaries, the four children of the "settlor. Therefore, it seems to me, there comes into being an "interest of quite a different nature from that which was created "during the lifetime of the settlor, to wit, two definite annuities "of £250 with different rights from anything the daughters had "before. Now, the daughters will not suffer any diminution if "the income of the funds is insufficient, and the ultimate "beneficiaries cannot touch the income of the appropriated fund, "but the daughters are to get annuities of a definite sum of £250 "each which are, if necessary, to be made up not only out of "the income of the appropriated funds, but out of the capital "of those appropriated funds if the income is insufficient for the "purpose of paying the annuities. It seems to me that these "are interests of quite different kinds which arise upon the death "of the settlor and, therefore, it seems to me, must fall within "the terms of section 2 (1) (d)."

So far as the judge's reasoning is based on his statement to the effect that in fact most of the time the top limit never came into consideration at all because the fund produced less than £500 per annum and that, accordingly, save in the exceptional years when it produced more, what the daughters got was a share in the annual income of the trust, this no longer holds good; for, as mentioned at the beginning of this judgment, I understand that it was in the course of the hearing before us agreed on both sides that one half of each year's income of the trust fund could be treated as having amounted at all material times to not less than £250.

So far as the judge proceeds on the ground that, apart from any question of deficiencies, a share of the income of a trust fund with a top limit is not an annuity, I think, with respect to him, that he takes too narrow a view. I have endeavoured earlier in this judgment to show that a trust in this form confers on the beneficiary rights not distinguishable, in any material respect, from those conferred by a trust for payment of an annuity out of the income of a particular fund, where the annuity is payable as regards each year only out of the income of that year with no right of recourse to future income or to capital.

So far as the judge founds himself on the difference between an annuity secured by the income of an appropriated fund with a right of recourse to capital, and an annuity (though he would not so term it) of the kind taken by each daughter in the present case, where the payment in respect of each year is limited to the designated income for that year and there is no right of recourse to capital, I do not think this change, which only concerns the security for the annuity, and not its amount or duration, is of such a character as to justify the conclusion that, as from the death of the settlor, each daughter became entitled to a new and different right to receive £250 per annum, which accordingly constituted a beneficial interest accruing or arising on the death of the deceased within the meaning of section 2 (1) (d). A provision for appropriation to answer an annuity is an administrative provision whereby the annuitant's rights are limited to a particular part of a fund in order that the remainder of the fund may be set free for distribution; and I do not think the use of such a provision in the present case makes the position any different for the present purpose from what it would have been if the settlement had simply directed that from and after the settlor's death each of the daughters, so long as she was living and unmarried, should receive an annuity of £250 payable as regards each year only out of one half of the income of the trust fund for that year. Such a direction could, in my view, hardly have been held to attract duty under section 2 (1) (d). The appropriation merely limits the annuitant's rights against income to the income of a particular fund, and makes up for that by giving a right of recourse to the capital of such fund.

Mr. Stamp argued that the right of the two daughters to share equally with the two sons in any surplus income for each year during the life of the settlor remaining after payment to each daughter of £250 for that year in some way affected the character of the maximum yearly sum of £250 so as to make it different from an annuity. I cannot follow this. An annuity in the strictest sense may well be given in conjunction with a provision to the effect that the surplus income for any year remaining after payment of the annuity is to be divided amongst a class which includes the annuitant.

The judge rightly took the view that the question at issue is not to be resolved by loose references to the substance as distinct from the form of the settlement; but that does not mean that it is not permissible to ascertain the true nature and effect of the rights conferred by the settlement, whatever forms of words or machinery of conveyancing the draftsman may have employed to confer them.

As regards the interest of each of the four children in the capital of the trust fund, I think the judge was clearly right in holding, as he did, that section 2 (1) (d) applied. Before the death of the settlor, each child had a future interest in the capital of the fund contingent on him or her surviving the settlor and uncertain as regards its amount, which depended on the number of children who might survive him. After the death of the settlor, each child had an absolutely vested interest in one-fourth of the capital of the trust fund, and the future income thereon. I find it impossible consistently with the ratio decidendi in Adamson's case,[13] as explained by Lord Porter in D'Avigdor-Goldsmid v. Inland Revenue Commissioners,[14] to hold that such vested interest in capital was not a beneficial interest accruing or arising on the death of the deceased within the meaning of section 2 (1) (d).

It is further, to my mind, quite plain that, in arriving at the extent or value of such beneficial interest, no deduction can be made in respect of the four children's interests pur autre vie in the surplus income during the life of the settlor, for these interests came to an end on his death. Any deduction in respect of their interests in expectancy is, of course, precluded by section 28 of the Finance Act, 1934.

For these reasons, I would allow this appeal, to the extent only of excluding from the property chargeable with duty under section 2 (1) (d) the funds appropriated to provide the two annuities.

Agency — Estate agent — Commission — Payable upon introduction of person "ready, willing and able to enter into a binding contract "to purchase my business" — Contract to purchase signed by purchaser — Rescinded before completion owing to innocent misrepresentation by agents' representative — Meaning of "binding "contract" — Whether agents' commission payable.

By a contract in writing contained in a commission note and entered into between the defendant, the owner of a garage, and the plaintiffs, who were estate agents, it was agreed that the plaintiffs' commission should be payable upon their "introducing "a person ready, willing and able to enter into a binding contract "to purchase" the property. A purchaser signed a contract to purchase the property and paid a deposit after being informed by a representative of the plaintiffs that a town planning scheme then in force would affect the property only to a very limited extent. The purchaser, who subsequently discovered that the scheme would affect the property substantially and would in fact result in the buildings on the site being demolished, resiled from the contract before completion, and the contract was eventually cancelled by agreement between the parties on payment of a certain sum by the purchaser to the defendant. The plaintiffs claimed their commission, but the defendant refused to pay.

In an action by the plaintiffs for damages for breach of contract, it was agreed that the purchaser had been induced to sign a contract by, inter alia, the statement made by the plaintiffs' representative:—

Held, (1) that the words "binding contract" when used in relation to a contract for the sale of property meant a contract which could be enforced by the vendor against the purchaser; that, on the true construction of the contract which was contained in the commission note, the plaintiffs' commission was payable when the contract to purchase the property had been shown to be a binding contract, and not necessarily at the moment that the contract to purchase was signed, as it might not be possible to say at that date or until completion whether the contract was binding or not.

(2) That as the purchaser had been induced to sign the contract by, inter alia, the innocent misrepresentation made by the plaintiffs' representative as to the effect of the town planning scheme, the purchaser was entitled to resile from the contract while it was still executory, and, therefore, the contract entered into was not a binding contract and the plaintiffs were not entitled to succeed.

Midgley Estates Ltd. v. Hand [1952] 2 Q.B. 432; [1952] 1 T.L.R. 1452; [1952] 1 All E.R. 1394 distinguished.

Action.

In 1954, the defendant, Mrs. Beatrice A. Burns, the owner of a garage at Three Mile Cross, near Reading, put the property in the hands of the plaintiffs, Peter Long and Partners, estate and business agents, and on August 8, 1954, she signed the following commission note: "I hereby appoint you my sole "agent for the sale of my business and property the details of "which are truly stated above and overleaf, at the price of "£9,750 and trade stocks at valuation. In consideration of your "services I undertake not to revoke this agreement and agree "to pay your commission in accordance with the terms stated "herein on the total purchase price (including stock) upon your "introducing a person ready, willing and able to enter into a "binding contract to purchase my business referred to above. "In further consideration of your services I agree to leave the "disposal of my business and property with you as my sole "agent for a period of three months from the date hereof, nor "will I consent to my business being sold except to a person "introduced by you." The following day, August 9, 1954, the plaintiffs wrote to the defendant stating that they accepted "the appointment to act as your sole agents in the disposal of the "above business for a period of three months from the 8th "instant, and confirm your valued instructions to introduce a "person able, ready and willing to purchase your concern at the "price of £9,750, or any other such price as you may hereafter "accept."

On September 12, 1954, a prospective purchaser, a Mrs. Pritchard, who had first heard that the garage was for sale through her husband's employers, and who had had no previous dealings with the plaintiffs, met the defendant at the garage premises, a representative of the plaintiffs, one Wade, being present at the meeting. A statement subsequently made by Wade, which was accepted by the defendant as a true account of the events which took place at the meeting, stated that Mr. Pritchard, who was also present at the meeting, asked him, Wade, if he knew of any town planning schemes, and Wade informed him that two or three feet would be taken from the forecourt of the garage. Mrs. Pritchard agreed to buy the property for £7,750, and signed the contract, paying to Wade a deposit of £300. On November 4, 1954, Mrs. Pritchard having discovered that a road widening scheme was in existence which, when put into force, would involve the acquisition by the county council of almost the entire site of the garage property and the demolition of the buildings upon it, informed the defendant through her solicitor that she could not continue with the purchase. Eventually, agreement was reached between the defendant and the purchaser to cancel the contract on payment by the purchaser to the defendant of £150. On January 12, 1955, the plaintiffs, at the request of the defendant, returned the £300 deposit to the purchaser but requested the payment of the commission which they alleged to be due to them. This the defendant refused to pay.

In this action, the plaintiffs, relying on the agreement contained in the commission note of August 8, 1954, claimed that they had negotiated on the defendant's behalf the sale of the property to Mrs. Pritchard, who had entered into a binding contract to purchase the property for £7,750; that their commission amounting to £387 10s. thereupon became due; that the defendant had refused, in breach of contract, to pay that sum; and that they were entitled to damages.

The defendant claimed that the contract was contained in the commission note signed on August 8, 1954, together with the letter from the plaintiffs dated August 9; alternatively, if the contract was contained in the commission note it had been varied by the letter and a further document dated October 16, 1954. She admitted that Mrs. Pritchard had entered into a contract to purchase the property, but denied that in the events which had happened it was a binding contract. She alleged that by reason of the innocent representation made by Wade, the plaintiffs' representative, acting for and on behalf of the defendant, Mrs. Pritchard had rescinded the contract before completion as she was entitled to do, and denied that the plaintiffs were entitled to the commission claimed or that they had suffered damage.

By their reply the plaintiffs contended, inter alia, that at all material times the contract was binding on Mrs. Pritchard; alternatively, that it was binding upon her until she rescinded it, which they did not admit she had a right to do.

At the trial it was agreed (1) that the writer of the letter of August 9, 1954, intended only to bring the name of the plaintiffs' firm before the defendant, and to emphasize that the rate of commission due to the plaintiffs was 5 per cent.; (2) that the plaintiffs asked the defendant to sign the document of October 16, 1954 (which related to commission), for the purpose only of insuring that their commission was secured; (3) that Mrs. Pritchard was induced to sign the contract to purchase the property, inter alia, by the statement made by Wade on September 12, 1954.

PETER LONG & PARTNERS v. BURNS.

South Leicestershire Permanent Benefit Building Society v. Freeman.[3]

LORD GODDARD C.J. This is a claim by a firm of house and business transfer agents for commission under the terms of a commission note given to them by the defendant on August 8, 1954. It is curious how many difficult points arise in cases relating to house agents' commission. I think it is largely due to the fact that agents, not unnaturally, try to frame the commission notes for their clients to sign in such a way as to avoid the decisions which are given by the courts from time to time in these cases. It has been laid down clearly and concisely by the Court of Appeal that the general understanding involved in the employment of a house or property agent to sell property is that he is to be remunerated only if the sale goes through, so that the vendor will receive the purchase price out of which he will pay the commission. That is the general principle, which applies in the absence of special circumstances or special terms. House agents try to frame their commission notes so that they will get commission although the actual sale may not materialize but may go off for one reason or another.

In the present case on August 8, 1954, the defendant, the owner of a garage at Three Mile Cross, a village three miles outside Reading, put the property into the hands of Messrs. Peter Long & Partners and signed this commission note: "I hereby "appoint you my sole agent for the sale of my business and "property the details of which are truly stated above and over-"leaf, at the price of £9,750 and trade stocks at valuation. In "consideration of your services I undertake not to revoke this "agreement and agree to pay your commission in accordance "with the terms stated herein on the total purchase price "(including stock) upon your introducing a person ready, willing "and able to enter into a binding contract to purchase my "business referred to above. In further consideration of your "services I agree to leave the disposal of my business and "property with you as my sole agent for a period of three months "from the date hereof, nor will I consent to my business being "sold except to a person introduced by you."

That commission note having been signed, the agent no doubt did something in the way of circularizing people; but in September a Mr. and Mrs. Pritchard came along as prospective buyers of the property. They were not introduced to the defendant by the plaintiffs at all, but that does not matter for the purpose of this action because the defendant had undertaken not to sell her property to anybody except a person introduced by the plaintiffs. She had bound herself so that she could not sell it to a friend of her own who came along; and therefore, if she sold the property to Mr. and Mrs. Pritchard, although they came along without any effort on the part of the plaintiffs, she would have to pay the plaintiffs' commission if the conditions of the commission note were to be fulfilled. [His Lordship stated the facts and continued.] The agents now claim that they are entitled to their commission, a very considerable one, because a person ready, willing and able to enter into a binding contract to buy the property did come forward, and a binding contract was entered into.

The day after the commission note was signed the plaintiffs wrote a letter to the defendant in which they said that they accepted "the appointment to act as your sole agents in the "disposal of the above business for a period of three months "from the 8th instant, and confirm your valued instructions to "introduce a person able, ready and willing to purchase your "concern at the price of £9,750, or any other such price as "you may hereafter accept." Mr. Stirling contended that that letter varied the terms of the commission note. The difficulty is that it does not seem to have been treated in that way by the parties. The defendant had already appointed the plaintiffs on the terms in the commission note and I do not think I can hold, in the circumstances, that that letter of August 9 varied the contract. It shows clearly what the plaintiffs had in mind, namely that they had to produce a purchaser. I am going to assume that the contract between the parties was as stated by the commission note, and that the commission was payable if the plaintiffs produced a person ready, willing and able to enter into a binding contract.

The first thing I have to consider is: What is the meaning of the words "binding contract"? I have to give a meaning to the word "binding." I think it means a contract which is enforceable. Every contract entered into freely between two persons, provided that it is not one of a class of contracts which is void, as, for instance, a contract entered into by an infant, or one entered into for some immoral or illegal purpose, is a binding contract, although it may be voidable. Mr. Dow, who argued this case very carefully and well, said that, whether the contract is induced by fraud or by innocent misrepresentation, unless and until it is set aside, it is a binding contract. But it may not be binding in one sense, because, until it is acted upon, it may not have any legal effect. In the present case, for instance, putting aside the question of misrepresentation for the moment, if the parties had completed, as the representation is not alleged to have been fraudulent, upon discovering the wide effect of the town and country planning scheme, the purchaser could not have avoided the transaction and demanded her money back. A party can only rescind on the ground of innocent misrepresentation while the contract is executory; but it was executory at the time when the purchaser resiled in the present case.

Mr. Dow argued that the commission note gave him a cause of action the moment that the contract was signed and said that he could have issued his writ there and then. I do not think that is so. I think that "binding contract" means, in a case concerned with the sale of property, a contract which can be enforced by the vendor against the purchaser. There are many contracts entered into with regard to the sale of land which, because of difficulties of title, or for some other reason, cannot be enforced and completion cannot be insisted upon. Sometimes the vendor can resile because some requisition is made with which the vendor is unable or unwilling to comply. Sometimes the purchaser discovers some fact which he had not known but which he had a right to know, or because there has been misrepresentation to him, albeit innocently, he has the right to rescind the contract. I think that the true construction of the present contract is that the commission is payable when the contract has been shown to be a binding contract; and it may be that it cannot be shown to be a binding contract until completion has taken place. In so holding I am not in any way departing from what was laid down in Midgley Estates Ltd. v. Hand,[1] in which the term "legally binding contract" was used. I do not think that the term "legally" makes any difference. "Binding" means "binding in law." In Midgley Estates Ltd. v. Hand [1] a purchaser having been introduced, the agents claimed that they were entitled to commission, and it was held that they were so entitled because the purchaser had signed a contract and no one disputed that that contract was binding upon him. He failed to complete because he had not got the money; but, nevertheless, the contract was a binding contract. The difference between Midgley's case [1] and the other cases which have been decided on matters regarding agents' commission was that the law now is that, if no special condition is imported, the agent is only entitled to his commission if the transaction really goes through and money is received by the vendor. In Midgley's case [1] the agent stipulated that he was entitled to receive his commission if a binding contract was executed; a binding contract was executed and no one suggested that it was a contract which could be rescinded. The reason why the vendor did not get the money was that the purchaser failed to pay because he had not got the money. The stipulation as to the legally binding contract which had been introduced enabled the agent to recover, although the principal did not receive the purchase price.

In the present case the words used are the same. The word "legally" makes no difference. The expression used is "a "binding contract." But this is not a case in which the purchaser says "I am bound by the contract but I cannot fulfil "it." It is said that this was not a binding contract. I have to consider whether it was a binding contract. As the parties have agreed that the purchaser was induced to sign the contract, among other things, by the statement made by the plaintiffs' representative, as to the effect of the town planning scheme, I am bound to hold that it was a contract induced by an innocent misrepresentation, and I cannot say that the representation was not made with reference to a substantial matter, and, although it was an innocent misrepresentation, it was a representation of which the purchaser was entitled to take advantage while the contract was still executory and say that she would not carry out her bargain because she had been induced to enter into it by the representation. It is true that the representation was an honest one, but it was one of the matters that induced her to enter into the contract. As I understand the law, a person is not bound to show that the innocent misrepresentation was the only representation made. If it was one of the representations made and was of a substantial nature and it affected her mind (and it is agreed that it did) I think she was entitled to say that she was entitled to resile from the contract. That is what she said. It is true that the defendant took up the attitude that the purchaser was not entitled to resile, and that the parties reached a settlement among themselves, but I cannot say that this was a binding contract, if it was one from which the purchaser was entitled to resile; and, on the agreed facts, I think she was entitled so to resile. Therefore, in my opinion, the true meaning of this commission note is that the money does not become payable at the moment the contract of sale was signed, because, until completion, one cannot say whether it was a binding contract of sale or not. If completion has taken place, well and good. It has been shown that this is not a binding contract of sale, because the purchaser had a right to rescind the contract and to say that it was not a contract binding upon her.

PETER LONG & PARTNERS v. BURNS.

Lord Goddard C.J.

For these reasons I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs cannot recover in this action, and the claim is dismissed with costs.

Assignment — Legal — Debt — Notice to debtor — Date of assignment wrongly stated—Law of Property Act, 1925 (15 & 16 Geo. 5, c. 20), s. 136 (1).

Notice to a debtor of assignment of the debt is not valid if the date of the assignment is wrongly stated in the notice.

On December 6, 1954, the defendant owed some £33 unpaid instalments under a hire-purchase contract, and was further liable to pay in due course some £170 in respect of future instalments. On December 7, the creditors assigned to the plaintiffs a purported debt of £203 said to be owed by the defendants. The plaintiffs sent to the defendant a notice, dated December 6, but not dispatched until December 8, stating that "the debt amounting to £203" had been assigned to them by "an indenture dated December 6":—

Held, that the notice failed to comply with the requirements of section 136 of the Law of Property Act, 1925,[1] and was invalid, as the date of the assignment was misstated.

Stanley v. English Fibres Industries Ltd. (1899) 68 L.J.Q.B. 839 approved.

Semble, that the misstatement of the amount presently due also invalidated the notice.

Appeal from His Honour Judge Harold Brown, sitting at St. Helens County Court.

The facts are stated in the judgment of Denning L.J.

W. G. O. Morgan for the plaintiffs.

The defendant did not appear.

Denning L.J. Mrs. Burke carries on a confectioner's business in Wigan, and she arranged with dealers called Harrisons to supply her with a refrigerated counter. She could not pay the money down, so it was arranged on hire-purchase terms. The hire-purchase company was the Woodcock Hire-Purchase Co. In the result, Woodcocks let to her a refrigerated counter on a payment of £30 down and 24 instalments of £8 9s. 6d. a month until a total of £233 8s. would be paid; and her husband guaranteed the payments. The first £30 was paid, but no more, because there was a dispute as to the quality of the article. Nothing now turns on that. That hire-purchase agreement was dated August 19, 1954. By an assignment of December 7, 1954, the Woodcock Co. purported to assign to the Harrison Co. "All those the "several debts or sums of money now legally due and owing to "'the vendor'"—that was to the Woodcock Co.—"by the "persons whose names and addresses and amounts of their "respective debts are set forth in the schedule hereunder "written"; and in the schedule was put the names of Mr. and Mrs. Burke, and the amount £203 8s. That is the date of the assignment. The date when it was executed, as appears from the document, was December 7, 1954. But apparently the day before that, on December 6, 1954, a letter, purporting to be a notice of assignment, was drawn up by Harrisons, dated

[1] Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 136: "(1) Any absolute assign- "ment by writing under the hand of "the assignor . . . of any debt or "other legal thing in action, of which "express notice in writing has been "given to the debtor . . . is effectual "in law . . . to pass and transfer "from the date of such notice—(a) "the legal right to such debt or thing "in action; (b) all legal and other "remedies for the same; and (c) the "power to give a good discharge for "the same without the concurrence "of the assignor: . . ."

December 6, 1954, and addressed to "Mrs. A. V. Burke." "Dear Madam, We hereby give you notice that by an indenture "dated December 6, 1954, the debt amounting to £203 8s. owing "by you to Woodcock Hire-Purchase Co. of Woodcock Street, "Wigan, has been assigned to us absolutely and the debt is now "due and owing to us. Also take notice that if you pay the "amount or any part thereof, to any person other than ourselves "or our authorized agent after receipt of this notice, you will still "be liable to us for the amount. Yours faithfully, for W. F. "Harrison & Co. Ltd." That letter was not dispatched to Mrs. Burke on December 6. It was sent by Harrisons to their solicitors, who sent it off to her on December 8, and it reached her on December 9.

The whole question in this case, as it comes before us, is whether that is a valid notice of assignment such as to transfer to Harrisons the legal right to sue for the debt. I ought to point out at once that the sum owing at that date of December 7, 1954, was not £203 8s., as stated in the assignment, but only the instalments which had then accrued due—£33 18s., and so the notice of assignment did not give the right figure for the debt. Further, apart from that, it gives the wrong date of the assignment: it said that the indenture was dated December 6, 1954, whereas the only assignment produced to the court is one dated December 7, 1954. The question is whether that error in giving the date of the assignment makes the notice bad.

In 1899, in Stanley v. English Fibres Industries Ltd.,[1] it was held by Ridley J. that if the date given for the assignment is bad, the notice does not comply with the requirements of the statute. I find myself in agreement with that decision. It is only necessary to read section 136 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, to realize that the notice in writing of the assignment is an essential part of the transfer of title to the debt, and, as such, the requirements of the Act must be strictly complied with, and the notice itself, I think, must be strictly accurate—accurate in particular in regard to the date which is given for the assignment; and even though it is only one day out, as in this case, the notice of assignment is bad.

I need not say anything about the amount of the debt, which in this case was put at £203 8s. when it was in fact only £33 18s.; but, as at present advised, I should have thought the notice of assignment ought to state the debt accurately too, because, after all, we are dealing with a transfer of title and the requirements of the Act must be strictly complied with. I find myself in agreement with the judgment of the county court judge that the assignee in this case did not prove a right or title in himself to this debt in accordance with the statute, and I think the appeal must fail.

W. F. Harrison & Co. Ltd. v. Burke.

Morris L.J. I agree. A question might be raised in regard to the assignment itself, which is an assignment of the debts or sums of money referred to in the schedule. The schedule refers to a debt owing from Mrs. Burke of £203. At the date of the assignment there was not a debt of £203. But we have not had argument in regard to the validity of the assignment itself, and so I express no opinion in regard to it. We have been concerned with the question as to whether there has been a valid notice in writing of the assignment. The section requires express notice in writing, and the section provides that after the giving of "express" notice in writing, the assignment "is effectual in "law . . . to pass and transfer from the date of such notice— "(a) the legal right to such debt or thing in action," etc.

Now, my Lord has read the terms of the notice in writing in this case, and it refers to the debt amounting to £203. If this is a good notice in writing, it would seem to be a notice as from the date of which there would be a "legal right to such debt," namely, a debt of £203. But there was not a debt of £203.

But again I do not think it necessary to decide this case on a consideration of the points that arise in regard to that aspect of the matter. I think the case can be decided by reference to the question of the date. The notice is dated December 6. Whether the purported assignment was good or not, it was not in existence on December 6. The purported assignment came into existence on December 7. But it seems to me that it is necessary to comply with the section, and I think that a notice given on December 6 purporting to be a notice in reference to an assignment dated December 6, when there was no such assignment in existence, was, therefore, not a good notice to enable the assignment that came into existence the following day to be effectual to pass the legal right to the debt assigned. I therefore agree that the judge came to a correct conclusion.

Parker L.J. I also agree.

Agriculture—Agricultural holding—Notice to quit—Tenant's counter-notice—Form—Truculent letter—Whether notice invoking statutory protection—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948 (11 & 12 Geo. 6, c. 63), s. 24 (1).

Practice—Notice.

The landlord of an agricultural holding served a notice to quit on the tenant who replied by letter: "I don't intend to go I shall "appeal against it and take the matter up with" the Agricultural Executive Committee:—

Held, that notices of this sort, whatever their form or language, should be held to be effective if they indicated so clear an intention to invoke the right which the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, gave that a landlord could not reasonably mistake what was meant; but that the tenant's letter in the present case did not reveal a sufficiently clear intention and was, therefore, not an effective counter-notice for the purposes of section 24 (1) of the Act.

APPEAL from Judge H. A. Tucker, sitting at Leek County Court.

George Martin was the landlord of an agricultural holding known as Bank Top Farm, Leekfrith, near Leek, Staffordshire, which was let on a ladyday tenancy to the defendant, Edward Hodkinson. On March 12, 1954, the landlord served on the tenant a notice determining the tenancy on March 25, 1955. On March 15, 1954, the tenant wrote to the landlord as follows: "In "reply to your notice that I received on Saturday I don't intend "to go I shall appeal against it and take the matter up with the "A.E.C." [the Agricultural Executive Committee] "As you "have no grounds on which to evict me I don't owe you any "thing if you did not have your rent direct you had it indirect "you had bills amounting to just over £60 that I paid for material "to the place last year and now you are prepared to be dirty "you can begin sharp and make an application for a government "grant for some stone for the road its your job and I shall have "the sanitary inspector to the house and the milk production "officer to the building and put you to a bit of expense now you "are not satisfied having it done for nothing." On January 4, 1955, the landlord died, and on February 23, 1955, probate was granted to the plaintiffs, Wilfred Mountford, William Read and Cuthbert Eric Herbert.

After the notice to quit expired the plaintiffs, as landlords, brought proceedings in the county court for possession. It was not disputed that the notice to quit was appropriate in all respects but the tenant sought to rely on his letter of March 15, 1954, as constituting an effective counter-notice for the purposes of section 24 (1) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948.[1] The county court judge decided in favour of the landlords and ordered that possession should be given to them in three months.

The tenant appealed.

R. E. Megarry for the tenant.

Peter A. Ferns for the landlords.

Mountford
v.
Hodkinson.

In addition to the cases referred to in the judgments, the following was cited in argument: Black & Black v. Mileham.[2]

Lord Evershed M.R. The question raised in this appeal is in truth, as Mr. Megarry said, within a very small compass. The question is whether a letter written by the tenant, and written (I think it may fairly be said) in the heat of the moment, is, within the terms of section 24 (1) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, a counter-notice in writing of the character there mentioned. I conclude, in agreement with the judge, that, applying the ordinary standards of common sense and of the significance of language, the answer to the question should be in the negative.

The question turns on the effect of this particular letter, which is not likely to be a model or precedent in other cases. [His Lordship stated the facts, referred to section 24 (1) of the Act of 1948, and continued:] The practical result is that if such a counter-notice is given [that is, a counter-notice within the scope of section 24 (1)], the landlord must apply to the Minister, whose powers and discretion in the matter have in fact been relegated by appropriate regulation to the appropriate Agricultural Executive Committee. [His Lordship read the tenant's letter of March 15, 1954, and went on:] I have said that, in my judgment, according to the ordinary standards of language and common sense, that document cannot fairly be treated as a counter-notice in writing requiring that section 24 (1) of the Agricultural Holdings Act should apply to the notice to quit which the tenant received.

The matter is, I think, not capable of much elaboration. I observe, however, that the terms of the subsection do not state (as they might) that if within a month the tenant gives a notice in writing objecting to the notice to quit, then certain consequences follow. The provision of section 24 (1) is that the tenant must serve a counter-notice in writing requiring that this subsection shall apply.

Mr. Megarry's argument rested, I think, in the main on the two phrases which appear early in this somewhat unpunctuated epistle: "I shall appeal against it and take the matter up with "the Agricultural Executive Committee." Mr. Megarry says that that is a sufficient indication to a well-informed and cautious landlord that the tenant was intending to invoke the right which he had under this section, the practical effect of which would be that, by the regulations, the Agricultural Executive Committee would have to give, so to speak, its imprimatur to the notice to quit. But I observe that when the tenant said that he would appeal against the matter and would take the matter up with the Agricultural Executive Committee, he was not in fact referring at all to the procedure which section 24 (1), if invoked, would bring into being. As I have indicated, if that provision is invoked, then it is for the landlord to invite the Minister (acting through the Agricultural Executive Committee) to give his confirmation to the notice to quit which has been given.

During the argument many examples were suggested to Mr. Megarry of letters in most informal or even vituperative terms, and the question was put: would this, that, or the other example be a counter-notice within this section? I do not refer to those examples because, as Mr. Megarry fairly said, we are here concerned, not with hypothetical cases, but with the effect of this particular letter. I, of course, agree with Mr. Megarry, and it is well established, that notices or counter-notices of the kind here in question are not to be construed with great strictness. It will suffice if, whatever the language or form of the letter, it indicates a clear intention to invoke the right which the Act gives. I have used deliberately the two words "clear intention" which I borrow from the judgment of Lord Greene M.R. in Price v. Mann,[1] to which Mr. Megarry referred. But I am bound to say that Mr. Megarry's argument really seems to me to amount to this, that any reference to legal rights or possible remedies, however ill-informed the writer is (and even if he did not know that he had such rights) would constitute a counter-notice requiring that section 24 (1) should operate. I cannot for myself think that the rules of these courts or of justice require or justify so very loose and indulgent a construction of the terms of the statute in favour of an agricultural tenant. I agree with the careful judgment of the county court judge. He said: "It is "said here that this particular section is a restriction on the "rights of the landlord and, therefore, that the provision must "be construed against the tenant. I do not in this case intend "to construe it against the tenant any more than against the "landlord. I am looking at the subsection itself. I turn again "to this letter which is the vital matter and there is certainly "no question of the defendant saying that he required this "section 24 to apply." With all of that I entirely agree. The county court judge continued: "I do not think it is clear that "he is requiring that this subsection should apply to the notice "to quit. I certainly should not have suspected from the letter "that he was requiring that the notice to quit should be dealt "with under the provisions of this subsection or that the letter "actually referred to it. There must be some reasonable "intimation by the tenant that he requires the subsection to "apply."

I agree with the judge and with the reasons which he gave. I think that this appeal should be dismissed.

BIRKETT L.J. I agree with the judgment of my Lord, the Master of the Rolls, and also with the judgment of the county court judge. I am bound to say that I feel sympathy with the

1956
MOUNTFORD v. HODKINSON.
Birkett L.J.

argument of Mr. Megarry to this extent, that I think when one is dealing with people like tenant-farmers one must make some allowance for the kind of language which they may happen to employ. As no particular form of words is required for the counter-notice under section 24 (1), I think that the court should regard with a benevolent eye any document which could reasonably be said to be a proper counter-notice within the section. But, after listening to the argument with considerable sympathy, I am driven to the conclusion that there was no other course which the judge could take other than he did in this case. I feel that the notice to quit sent by the landlord on March 12, 1954, was a very careful notice in perfectly legal form, and I think that it may be a reasonable inference that Mr. Martin knew the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, which in the year 1954 had been in operation for a long time.

As I said in the course of the argument, one can conceive a kindly landlord saying, when a letter of this kind is received: "The man is very angry and he obviously wants the committee "to intervene. This is no counter-notice, but I think I will just "put him right about the legal form." There is, of course, no obligation on the landlord to do anything of that kind. We have to decide the simple question whether a notice in the terms of this letter can possibly be said to be a compliance with the section in this sense, that it can be interpreted as saying: "I "require section 24 (1) of the Act of 1948 to apply to this "notice." I think it is quite impossible to do so.

One other point I think is also rather important. Since 1948 the Agricultural Executive Committee have played a very important part in what I may call the general scheme of agricultural holdings. Section 24 was then an entirely new thing. [His Lordship read section 24 (1) and continued:] There is no provision in the Act for an extension of that period; the counter-notice must be served within the month or, so far as I know, the remedy has gone. I should have thought it was of the first importance to tenants that they should make themselves acquainted with a section which was intended to give them some measure of security of tenure.

The only question here is whether the county court judge was right in saying, in effect: "I cannot construe this rather angry "letter—even though it contains reference to an appeal to the "Agricultural Executive Committee—as being a compliance with "the section, or interpret it as a counter-notice within the mean-"ing of the subsection." I think that it was quite impossible for the judge to say that it was. I entirely agree with what he said, and I agree with the judgment of my Lord in this case.

Romer L.J. I also agree. It is quite clear that, although according to the actual language of section 24 (1), a tenant who wants to serve a counter-notice at all must serve a counter-notice in writing requiring that the subsection shall apply to the notice to quit, the tenant can plainly indicate his intention that he desires to take advantage of the subsection without exactly following that language. But the question is how far he can depart from it.

For my part, I think that the position was put accurately by Mr. Miles who was acting for the tenant in Ward v. Scott,[2] to which Mr. Megarry referred us. In that case the tenant of an agricultural holding was given notice to quit, and he served a counter-notice which was perfectly right in form except that it referred to the Act of 1947 instead of the Act of 1948, section 31 of the Act of 1947, by the time he served his notice, having been replaced by section 24 of the Act of 1948. It was objected on behalf of the landlord in that case that the notice was not a valid counter-notice. Apparently, according to the judgment which Danckwerts J. delivered, Mr. Miles for the tenant had said: "The court is indulgent in respect of notices of this kind and does "not in effect care for merely technical points, and if the mean- "ing is so plain that the landlord cannot mistake what is meant, "then effect should be given to the notice." That proposition, I think, commended itself to Danckwerts J., though he actually decided the case on another point. For my part, I think that is right, though perhaps subject to this, as Mr. Megarry pointed out, that one should add the word "reasonably" so as to make it read: "and if the meaning is so plain that the landlord cannot "reasonably mistake what is meant, then effect should be given "to the notice." It seems to me to be the proper test to apply to notices of this sort. The reason why the tenant has to make his intention reasonably clear is that the landlord has to take action upon the counter-notice. Under the Agricultural Regulations, 1948,[3] he has, within one month of being served with a counter-notice, to make application to the Minister for his consent. It is, therefore, quite obvious that he has to have served upon him some notice which he understands, that is to say, a notice which reasonably indicates that the tenant is intending to invoke, and is in fact invoking, the operation of section 24 (1). Unless the notice sufficiently enables the landlord to understand that, I think that it is a bad notice.

For the reasons which the county court judge stated in his judgment, it seems to me quite impossible to say that the counter-notice now in question satisfied that criterion, and I, accordingly, agree that this appeal fails.

Palatine Court of Lancaster—Transfer of action.

After an action had been set down for hearing in the Chancery Division of the High Court in London, the date of the hearing had been fixed and the action was in the warned list, the plaintiff applied for and obtained an order from the district registrar transferring the action to the County Palatine Court of Lancaster in Liverpool. The defendant sought by motion to have the district registrar's order discharged:—

Held, (1) that in the circumstances the district registrar ought not to have heard the application for the transfer but ought to have adjourned it to the judge.

(2) That, accordingly, the court could entertain a motion to discharge the district registrar's order.

Harrington v. Ramage [1907] W.N. 137 distinguished.

(3) That while the court had power under section 1 of the Court of Chancery of Lancaster Act, 1952, to transfer the action to the County Palatine Court of Lancaster at any stage of the proceedings, it was not expedient to do so in the present case and that accordingly the district registrar's order must be discharged.

MOTION to discharge order of district registrar.

The applicant, Madeline Phyllis Ryman, of Colwyn Bay, was the defendant in an action brought by Christina Brown Fullerton for a declaration that certain land at Colwyn Bay which had been conveyed to the defendant but for which the plaintiff had provided the purchase money was held by the defendant on trust for the plaintiff. The action was set down for hearing in London on November 7, 1955, and the date originally fixed for the hearing was January 16, 1956. On January 4, 1956, on an order for further directions, the plaintiff was given leave by the district registrar to amend her pleadings. In these circumstances an application was made by the plaintiff to postpone the hearing and the new date fixed by the judge was March 5, 1956. On February 22, 1956, the defendant applied for a further postponement because of the illness of one of her witnesses, and the new date fixed by the judge for the hearing was April 10, 1956. On February 28, 1956, the plaintiff applied to, and obtained from, the district registrar an order transferring the action from the Chancery Division of the High Court in London to the County Palatine Court of Lancaster in Liverpool on the ground that since the parties and witnesses all lived at Colwyn Bay, which was only 50 miles from Liverpool, Liverpool was a more convenient venue. The defendant now sought by this application to have this order of the district registrar discharged.

H. E. Francis, for the defendant applicant, submitted that while it was within the jurisdiction of the district registrar to transfer the venue on the summons for directions he had no power to do so once the date of the hearing had been fixed. He referred to Spring v. National Amalgamated Stevedores and Dockers Society.[1]

A. C. Sparrow, for the plaintiff respondent, contended that the proper course for the defendant would have been to ask the district registrar before his order was drawn up to adjourn the matter to the judge, but that, as the defendant had failed to do so, the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the present motion. He referred to Harrington v. Ramage.[2]

UPJOHN J. stated the facts and continued: Mr. Sparrow has very properly called my attention to the decision of Kekewich J. in Harrington v. Ramage [2] to the effect that a motion to set aside or vary a master's order ought to be dismissed with costs without going into merits since the proper course for a party who wanted a matter to be dealt with by the judge was to ask the master, before his order was drawn up, to adjourn the matter to the judge. However, that case does not cover the present case, since here the date of the hearing had already been fixed and the action was in the warned list when the application to transfer the action was made to the district registrar. In these circumstances, in accordance with the usual practice, the district registrar should not have heard the application but should, of his own motion, have immediately adjourned it to the judge.

I must, therefore, deal with the present application on its merits. I have no doubt that under section 1 of the Court of Chancery of Lancaster Act, 1952, I have jurisdiction at any time or at any stage to transfer the action to the County Palatine Court of Lancaster, but the question is whether I ought to do so. Mr. Sparrow has contended that Liverpool is a more convenient forum for the action to be heard since the parties and witnesses all live at Colwyn Bay, which is only 50 miles from Liverpool. However, what weighs with me is the fact that it is clearly most desirable, after the many postponements of the hearing of the action that have already taken place, that the matter shall be disposed of as soon as possible. As things stand at present the case is due to be heard on April 10. I think that it is likely that, if the action were now to be transferred to Liverpool, it would not be heard so soon. I will therefore grant the defendant's motion and discharge the order of the district registrar.

PRACTICE NOTE.

Crown Practice—Appearance of applicant in person—Right of—Court of Appeal.

Court of Appeal—Appellant appearing in person—Right to be heard—Prerogative writ—Appeal from refusal of certiorari—Right of appellants to appear in person.

PRELIMINARY OBJECTION on appeal from Divisional Court.

Eight out of the twelve governors of a voluntary school, the Avigdor Secondary Grammar School, Stoke Newington, including their chairman, Dr. Solomon Schonfeld, appeared in person on an appeal from the dismissal by the Divisional Court (Lord Goddard C.J., Ormerod and Barry JJ.) on October 28, 1955, of their application for an order of certiorari to quash the decision of the staff sub-committee of the Education Committee of the London County Council, refusing consent to the dismissal of the headmaster, Jacob David Crystal. Counsel for the headmaster sought to make a preliminary objection that the appellants were not entitled to appear in person.

Geoffrey Lawrence Q.C. and H. E. Francis for the staff sub-committee.

Viscount Hailsham Q.C., A. L. J. Lincoln and Quintin J. Iwi for the headmaster.

Viscount Hailsham Q.C. for the headmaster. The Divisional Court dismissed with costs the application by the governors of the school as a body. The governors are the only parties to the appeal and their interest is joint only. The eight individual appellants are not parties to these proceedings in their personal capacity but only as governors; and though the board of governors is not a corporation, the governors, or some of them, cannot each appear individually in a suit in which they are joint parties. Further, on November 22, 1929, Scrutton L.J., as reported only in The Times newspaper for November 23, 1929, observed that the Court of Appeal had made it a rule and had acted on it for a hundred years, that persons coming for prerogative writs must do so by counsel. It is conceded that since 1947 (see Practice Note [1947] W.N. 218) the Divisional Court has established the practice that an individual applying for a prerogative order may appear in person; but the practice in the Court of Appeal has not been changed since the dictum of Scrutton L.J.; and if this court now decides that that practice is to be altered, the court will be creating a precedent.

[DENNING L.J. I am not sure that on these prerogative writs a person aggrieved should not be allowed to come in person. If each of these eight governors is personally liable for the costs in the Divisional Court, has not each of them a locus standi to appeal in this court?]

They must have a joint interest. The individuals now seeking to appeal are only a majority of a board who dissent from the minority and seek to appeal, not as a board, but through a person who happens to be the chairman of the board, but expressly disclaims his representative capacity.

[ROMER L.J. But unless Dr. Schonfeld was expressly authorized by the other governors to act for them, the other governors could not have been held liable for the costs in the court below.]

The court, after conferring, decided that they would hear the appeal on the merits and rule on the preliminary objection later. They directed that all the eight appellants should attend before the court so that if any desired to address the court individually they might do so.

(The following extracts from the judgments of the court were concerned specifically with the point of practice.)

DENNING L.J. The foundation governors did not instruct counsel to appear before us, but appeared individually in person. The only one of them who put forward sustained arguments was Dr. Schonfeld, who, of course, could speak only for himself and not for the others. Mr. Weil, the vice-chairman, also addressed us for a few minutes. It was submitted by counsel for the headmaster that the foundation governors could not appear in person, but only by counsel on such an application; and he referred to the observations of Scrutton L.J. on November 22, 1929 (The Times newspaper, November 23, 1929, "Colonel Kynaston's "Appeal") that ". . . [the] court had made it a rule, and "had acted on it for a hundred years, that persons coming to "apply for the prerogative of mandamus must do so by counsel, "and must be represented by counsel." Lord Hailsham told us, however, that the Divisional Court in 1947 had departed from that rule. Lord Goddard C.J. said that the judges had decided that prerogative orders might be moved for by litigants in person (Practice Note [1947] W.N. 218). I think we should do the same. Much as we value the help of the Bar, we must never go so far as to refuse an applicant simply because he is in person.

Reg. v. Staff Sub-Committee of London County Council's Education Committee.

Morris L.J. The application is brought by eight of the twelve governors, namely, the eight foundation governors. Those eight have appealed. There are often reasons why it is helpful from the point of view of the court that there should be appearance by counsel in cases of this kind. The eight appellants, however, appeared personally. Their interest in this case is a joint one, and we have heard two of the appellants. In fact none of the other appellants wished to address us. I see no reason for not allowing Dr. Schonfeld and his colleagues to appear in person, though, the interest being a joint one, we would not have arguments from each one separately.

Romer L.J. I quite agree. On the preliminary point taken by Lord Hailsham for the headmaster, I have nothing to add to what my Lords have said. Having regard to the established practice of the court it is quite plain that Dr. Schonfeld could not appear on behalf of the other governors as well as on behalf of himself; but he was entitled to address us on his own behalf, and he did so. The substance of his arguments and submissions was adopted in effect by his fellow governors.

* CROOK v. DERBYSHIRE STONE LTD. and Another.

Vicarious Liability—Master and servant—Negligence—Accident while lorry driver crossing road for refreshment during break in journey—Liability of master.

T., a lorry driver employed by D. S. Ltd., was engaged in driving loads of stone from the company's quarries to a building site. His journey was of about four hours' duration and it was his practice to stop for refreshment en route. The company was aware of this practice and impliedly authorised it. T. left the driving cab of his employer's vehicle to go into a café to obtain refreshment. In crossing the road he was involved in a collision with the plaintiff, a motor-cyclist, who sought to establish the liability of the company for the negligence of T. their servant:—

Held, that, although employed at the time on his master's business and permitted to do what he was then doing, T. was a stranger to his master from the moment when he left the lorry and had no further duty to perform on his master's account until he returned to the lorry and resumed his journey; accordingly, as T. was not in fact discharging his duty to his employers at the moment of the accident, they were not vicariously responsible for the consequences of his negligence.

Century Insurance Co. Ltd. v. Northern Ireland Road Transport Board [1942] A.C. 509; [1942] 1 All E.R. 491 distinguished.

ACTION.

The first defendants, Derbyshire Stone Ltd., were engaged in fulfilling a contract for the supply of stone from their quarries near Matlock to a building site near Birmingham. The second defendant, Bertie Thorpe, was one of their regular drivers. On occasions he left Matlock at about 4 a.m., arriving at his destination at 8 a.m. In accordance with his practice and that of other drivers, known to the employers and impliedly sanctioned by them, he would stop in the course of his journey to obtain refreshment. On June 30, 1952, shortly before 8 a.m., Thorpe was crossing one section of a dual carriageway to get to a café on the other side of the road when the plaintiff, John Crook, riding his motor-cycle, collided with Thorpe, and both Thorpe and the plaintiff sustained injuries. It was not in dispute that Thorpe was in part to blame for the collision. The plaintiff claimed damages against the first defendants and against Thorpe. As regards the first defendants, it was alleged that, in the circumstances, Thorpe was acting in the course of his employment so as to render the company responsible to the plaintiff for Thorpe's negligence.

A. E. James for the plaintiff.
Patrick Bennett for the first defendants.
A. J. Flint for the second defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

February 20. PILCHER J. stated the facts and continued: The first defendants have never forbidden their lorry drivers to stop at wayside cafés for refreshment, and I am assuming for the purposes of this case that this practice, and it is a necessary practice, was well known to the first defendants, and was one which was sanctioned by them impliedly. It was common ground that the accident occurred during Thorpe's working hours. There was no evidence as to how he was paid, whether by the hour or by the journey, but in the ordinary sense of the word the accident occurred in working hours; and Mr. James contended that, in walking across the road as he did and for the purpose which he did, Thorpe was doing something which his employers knew their drivers did, and did reasonably, especially when doing early runs. He contended that in so crossing the road to get refreshment for his own purposes Thorpe was doing an act which was incidental to his employment and that, in those circumstances, in law his employers were vicariously responsible for any act of negligence which he might commit whilst engaged in this incidental action. Whilst an employer is no doubt vicariously responsible for the negligent acts of his servants committed in the course of their employment, he is not, in my view, necessarily responsible for the consequences of acts committed by his servants during their period of employment, unless the particular act which is negligently performed was an act which the servant was employed to perform.

1956

Crook v. Derbyshire Stone Ltd.

In the present case, if Thorpe had been employed by his employers to deliver some portable goods at the café in question and had, through his own negligence, sustained exactly the type of accident which he did sustain, and had done the injuries to the plaintiff which he did do, no doubt the argument advanced by Mr. James would be almost bound to succeed, because, assuming that it was reasonable for him to draw up his lorry where he did and cross the road at the place where he did, if he does that negligently in the course of delivering goods to their destination, no doubt his employers have got to answer for the consequences of his negligence, because he was actually engaged in doing what he was employed to do. But, to my mind, Thorpe was in no sense of the word employed to cross the road. He did it primarily for his own purposes, though, no doubt, with the complete approval of his employers. He had left his lorry and was no longer engaged in the ordinary sense of the word upon his employers' business.

Mr. James cited, and Mr. Bennett, on behalf of the first defendants, relied upon, Century Insurance Co. Ltd. v. Northern Ireland Road Transport Board.[1] That was a case in which a number of matters came up for decision, but I need only refer to one particular point which was dealt with by the noble Lords. In that case a lorry driver employed to drive a petrol lorry and deliver petrol from that lorry into the underground tank of a garage, whilst so transferring the petrol from the lorry to the tank, having opened the tap in the lorry and put the nozzle down into the tank, struck a match to light a cigarette, threw the match on the floor, as a result of which there was a conflagration and explosion and a great deal of damage was done. Claims were made upon the lorry driver's employers on the ground that, in doing the negligent act, the lorry driver was acting in the course of his employment and thus that his employers were vicariously responsible for the consequences of his negligence.

The case came before the House of Lords on appeal from the Court of Appeal in Northern Ireland, who had held that the driver's employers, in the particular circumstances of that case, were responsible for their driver's negligence in relation to the cigarette and the match. The House of Lords affirmed the decision of the Court of Appeal.

In the course of his speech Viscount Simon L.C. said[2]: "On

"the second question"—and this was the second question—"every judge who has had to consider the matter in Northern "Ireland agrees with the learned arbitrator in holding that "Davison's careless act which caused the conflagration and "explosion was an act done in the course of his employment. "Admittedly, he was serving his master when he put the nozzle "into the tank and turned on the tap. Admittedly, he would "be serving his master when he turned off the tap and withdrew "the nozzle from the tank. In the interval, spirit was flowing "from the tanker to the tank, and this was the very delivery "which the respondents were required under their contract to "effect. Davison's duty was to watch over the delivery of the "spirit into the tank, to see that it did not overflow, and to turn "off the tap when the proper quantity had passed from the "tanker. In circumstances like these, 'they also serve who "'only stand and wait.' He was presumably close to the "apparatus, and his negligence in starting smoking and in "throwing away a lighted match at that moment is plainly "negligence in the discharge of the duties on which he was "employed by the respondents. This conclusion is reached on "principle and on the evidence, and does not depend on finding a "decided case which closely resembles the present facts." Then he went on to deal with Jefferson v. Derbyshire Farmers Ltd.,[3] which is a case to which I do not find it necessary to refer, because it was considered by the noble Lords in the Century Insurance case.[4]

Lord Wright, in the course of his speech, said[5]: "On the "other question, namely, whether Davison's negligence was in "the course of his employment, all the decisions below have been "against the appellants. I agree with them and need add little. "The act of a workman in lighting his pipe or cigarette is an act "done for his own comfort and convenience and, at least gener-"ally speaking, not for his employer's benefit, but that last "condition is no longer essential to fix liability on the employer." He then referred to Lloyd v. Grace, Smith & Co.,[6] which decided that the tortious act of the servant need not be an act done by the servant for the benefit of his employers, and continued: "Nor is such an act prima facie negligent. It is in itself both "innocent and harmless. The negligence is to be found by "considering the time when and the circumstances in which the "match is struck and thrown down. The duty of the workman "to his employer is so to conduct himself in doing his work as "not negligently to cause damage either to the employer himself "or his property or to third persons or their property, and thus "to impose the same liability on the employer as if he had been "doing the work himself and committed the negligent act. This "may seem too obvious as a matter of common sense to require "either argument or authority. I think what plausibility the " contrary argument might seem to possess results from treating " the act of lighting the cigarette in abstraction from the " circumstances as a separate act."

Whilst clearly permitted to stop for refreshment and, if necessary, to cross the road for that purpose, Thorpe was not, in my view, employed to do this. Even though employed at the time on his master's business and permitted to do what he did in crossing the road to get refreshment, he was a stranger to his master from the moment when he left the lorry. He had no further duty to perform on his master's account until he returned to the lorry and resumed his journey. In this respect his position was, in my view, completely different to that of Davison, the driver in the Century Insurance case,[7] because, when Davison negligently threw down the match, he was engaged on his master's business, namely, supervising the discharge of the petrol. No doubt it is difficult upon the particular facts of each individual case to draw the line between the circumstances in which it may be proper to say that a servant is discharging his duty as a servant, and circumstances in which he is with the permission of his employer doing some act incidental to his employment.

Examples are seldom helpful, but perhaps one may be permitted to consider two or three cases which might have to be determined in facts almost similar to the facts of this case. It is interesting to inquire (and might be very difficult to resolve) what the position would be if a lorry driver in Thorpe's position crossed the road to ask the way, or crossed the road to get a tin of petrol to put into his lorry; or, indeed, what the position might have been if, returning from the café, Thorpe had seen somebody getting into his lorry and about to drive it off and had hurried across the road to stop him and had been involved in the collision which he was involved in. Those are all matters which may fall on one side or the other of the line; but perhaps it is sufficient for me to say that in the present case, on the admitted facts, I am not satisfied that it would be proper to say that, although permitted to do what he did, Thorpe was in fact discharging his duty to his employer at the time when the accident occurred. I think he was not. I think at that moment of time he was a stranger to his employer and that his employer was not, therefore, vicariously responsible for the consequences of Thorpe's negligence.

I conclude what I have to say by quoting a passage from Clerk and Lindsell on Torts. The only edition that I have here is the 10th edition, and the passage to which I want to refer is at p. 122. It is in the following terms: " A master will not usually " be responsible for the servant's negligence in doing something " which he is merely permitted to do or does for his own purposes, " but is not employed to do. If a servant does an act for his " own pleasure, quoad that act he is a stranger to his master, " although he may be in other respects engaged at the time upon " the master's business, and the mere fact that the master does " not prohibit the doing of the act ought not to render him " liable."

1956

CROOK v. DERBYSHIRE STONE LTD.

It is on that principle and for the reasons that I have given that I find, on the facts of this particular case, that the first defendants are not responsible for the consequences of the negligence of their servant Thorpe.

Revenue—Income tax—Expenses—Travel expenses—Husband and wife company—Company dealing in refrigeration—Visit to Australia to study refrigeration methods—" Personal equipment "—Husband's travel expenses allowable—No evidence wife's visit for purposes of company's business—Wife's expenses not allowable—Income Tax Act, 1952 (15 & 16 Geo. 6 & 1 Eliz. 2, c. 10), 9*th Sched., para.* 7.

A taxpayer and wife were the sole directors of, and owned all the shares in, a private limited company which dealt in refrigerators and refrigeration equipment. The taxpayer worked full time in the company's business, but the wife, who was also the secretary of the company, did not attend the company's business premises in the year of assessment, and any documents requiring her signature were signed at home.

The taxpayer and his wife went to Australia to study refrigeration methods there. The taxpayer undertook engagements relating to the company's business throughout the tour, but that the wife accompanied him only on some four occasions. There was no resolution of the company providing that she should go to Australia on the company's business, but merely a statement by the taxpayer that he thought she should go with him.

The Special Commissioners found as a fact that the expenses of the taxpayer and his wife incurred in travelling to Australia were " wholly, exclusively and necessarily " in the performance of their office as directors within paragraph 7 of the Ninth Schedule to the Income Tax Act, 1952.

On appeal by the Crown from that decision, it was contended on behalf of the Crown that the expenses were incurred by the taxpayer in acquiring " personal equipment " in respect of his business as a dealer in refrigerators:—

Held, (1) that as there was evidence on which the commissioners were entitled to find that the husband's expenses were incurred for the purposes of his business within paragraph 7, the appeal should be dismissed in respect of his expenses.

Maclean (Inspector of Taxes) v. Trembath.

(2) That there was no evidence that the company required the wife's visit to Australia or that she was occupied with the company's business while she was there, and although there was a business element in her visit it was not on the evidence "wholly "and exclusively" for the company's business, and similarly the expenses of her visit were not incurred "necessarily" for the company's business; her travel expenses were not, therefore, a deductible expense within paragraph 7, and the appeal would be allowed in respect of her expenses.

Case stated by the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts.

The question for the determination of the commissioners was whether an amount of £1,220 was allowable as a deductible expense under paragraph 7 of the 9th Schedule to the Income Tax Act, 1952,[1] to a taxpayer, N. L. Trembath.

The following facts were found on the case stated: Sums totalling £1,220 were claimed by the taxpayer in connexion with a visit by him and his wife to Australia; of this amount, the assessment under appeal had made allowances for £66. At the hearing of the appeal before the commissioners, the inspector of taxes proposed to withdraw this allowance of £66, while the taxpayer claimed that the whole sum of £1,220 was properly allowable under paragraph 7.

The taxpayer attended and gave evidence before the commissioners—and it was stated at the hearing before the court although it was not stated in the case—he was cross-examined before them.

"(2) The provisions of subsection "(1) of this section shall not apply "to expense incurred by the body "corporate in or in connection with "the provision for a director or "employee, in any of its business "premises, of any accommodation, "supplies or services provided for the "director or employee himself and "used by him solely in performing "the duties of his office or employ- "ment."

S. 162: "(1) Any expense incurred "by a body corporate in the acquisi- "tion or production of an asset which "remains its own property shall be "left out of account for the purposes "of the last preceding section."

Ninth Sched.: "Rules applicable to "Schedule E." 7: "If the holder "of an office or employment of profit "is necessarily obliged to incur and "defray out of the emoluments there- "of the expenses of travelling in the "performance of the duties of the "office or employment, or of keeping "and maintaining a horse to enable "him to perform the same, or other- "wise to expend money wholly, "exclusively and necessarily in the "performance of the said duties, "there may be deducted from the "emoluments to be assessed the "expenses so necessarily incurred and "defrayed."

The company, Trembath & Co. Ltd., was a private limited company incorporated in November, 1946, and its principal objects as set out in its memorandum of association were: "(1) To carry on the business of refrigeration and electrical "engineers and manufacturers of and dealers in refrigeration "and cold storage equipment, plant and apparatus of every "description including housings and fixtures, shop equipment "and domestic and electrical appliances and all things capable "of being used therewith or in the maintenance, repair and "manufacture thereof. (2) To enter into hire-purchase agree-"ments with the purchasers of such articles and goods aforesaid "and to negotiate, assign, mortgage or pledge such agreements "for cash or otherwise or the payments due or rights accruing "thereunder."

At all material times the taxpayer and his wife between them held all the issued shares in the company, and were its only directors.

The company had at all material times been an authorized dealer in the products of the Frigidaire Division of General Motors Ltd. (hereinafter called "Frigidaire"), a company associated with General Motors Corporation, a company incorporated in the U. S. A. (hereinafter called "General Motors"). These products fell into two categories, "Commercial Products" (i.e., equipment and installations of the kind used by commercial undertakings, including cold storage display installations for retail shops) and "Domestic Products" (i.e., those of the kind used for domestic purposes). The commercial products accounted for about three-quarters of the company's business, and the domestic products for about one-quarter. In addition to selling the products, the company undertook the installation, repair and maintenance of commercial products which it had sold.

The company's business in connexion with Frigidaire Commercial Products was regulated by an agreement between the company and Frigidaire, dated May 6, 1948, by which the company was appointed sole authorized dealer in the commercial products for a territory covering the major part of South London and Surrey.

Under clause 4 of the agreement the company was prohibited from selling Frigidaire Commercial Products abroad; and under clause 7, except as otherwise provided by the agreement, the company was prohibited from selling such products outside its own territory and from selling, either within or outside its own territory, any goods in competition with Frigidaire products.

The company's business in connexion with Frigidaire domestic products was regulated by a separate agreement (which, mutatis mutandis, was in the same terms as the above-mentioned agreement) and consisted in buying goods from Frigidaire at a discount and re-selling them at a reduced discount to retail dealers within the company's territory. There were about thirty other authorized dealers, each operating in their own territories under similar agreements with Frigidaire, covering the whole of the British Isles.

Clause 13 of that agreement provided that: "The Dealer" —which in this context meant the company—"shall maintain "within the territory such one or more places of business and "such sales staff, service staff and transport facilities as the "company [Frigidaire] shall consider necessary to ensure "adequate and efficient selling coverage and service facilities "throughout the territory. When reasonably requested to do so "by the company [Frigidaire] the dealer [the company] shall at "its own expense send representatives to Hendon or some other "convenient place designated by the company for the purpose of "instruction in the sale, application, installation and servicing "of 'Frigidaire' Commercial Products. . . ."

In connexion with clause 13, all of the company's staff had attended instructional courses at the Frigidaire instructional establishment at Hendon, at Frigidaire's request and at the company's expense. The company had also sent members of its staff to other dealers to gain experience, on its own initiative. Frigidaire had not formally requested any dealer to go abroad in pursuance of clause 13, but some had gone on their own initiative, and their visits to Frigidaire establishments abroad had been planned for them by Frigidaire. The taxpayer had himself been to Holland and Paris to visit factories; he did so at the suggestion (but not on the formal request) of Frigidaire. He had not been requested by Frigidaire to visit Australia.

The taxpayer worked full time in the direction and management of the company's business. The company had two warehouses and a showroom, and about half of his time was spent on the company's premises and about half on outside jobs, discussing proposals for installations with customers and supervising installations. In order to make the company's business in connexion with the commercial products successful, it was necessary for him not only to have the technical knowledge required for the installation of the products, but also to have the experience and imagination which would enable him to recommend types and arrangements of plant most suitable for the requirements of the individual commercial customer, particularly in connexion with the use of refrigeration in connexion with goods on display. As regards the commercial products the company had been faced with (and had met successfully) considerable competition in its territory; part of its success was due to the taxpayer's ability to "sell an idea."

In 1952 the taxpayer made up his mind to visit Australia in order to gain experience of refrigeration methods and distribution methods there, and in particular of the use of refrigeration in connexion with goods on display.

Australia being a very progressive country as regards refrigeration, and the trading conditions there being similar to those in the United Kingdom, he thought that by the visit he would gain knowledge and experience which would be of great assistance to the company's business. He had close family connexions with Australia—two brothers and a sister lived there—and he himself was born there, and that had influenced him a little in his decision, but apart from that he considered that the company would profit from a visit by him to Australia, and would profit more by a visit to Australia than to any other country.

By 1952 the company's business had become well established and the taxpayer wanted to get new ideas in order to maintain the company's progress.

The taxpayer decided that his wife should accompany him to Australia. Mrs. Trembath did not attend and give evidence before the Special Commissioners. She was a director and secretary of the company. She had no technical qualifications. She had been engaged (but not full time) in the company's office work, but during the year of assessment 1953–1954 she did not attend the company's premises, and any documents which needed her signature as secretary were dealt with by her at home. She was of assistance to the taxpayer in forming ideas as to ways in which commercial products could be used, and she was a good conversationalist, which the taxpayer was not.

The taxpayer discussed his projected visit to Australia with officials of Frigidaire, and (after being satisfied with the arrangements for the management of the company's business during his absence) they approved of it and made arrangements for him to visit General Motors installations and officials at Melbourne, Sydney and Brisbane.

The taxpayer and his wife left England in September, 1953, and returned on February 1, 1954. The journeys, by sea in both directions, occupied eight weeks, and eleven weeks were spent in Australia. The taxpayer kept no detailed diary of their eleven weeks in Australia, but the following was a summary of their movements.

They disembarked at Sydney, where they stayed five days with friends. Two of these days the taxpayer spent at the General Motors offices with the director in charge (his wife accompanying him on one day) and he spent about half a day with a distributor of General Motors products (unaccompanied by his wife).

They then spent seven days at Rockhampton, where they stayed with friends. There the taxpayer visited an abattoir (said to be the largest in the world), accompanied (on one day) by his wife.

They then spent six days at Brisbane, where they stayed with the taxpayer's brother. There the taxpayer spent three days at the General Motors distribution centre (accompanied by his wife on one day) and spent a further day with a dealer looking over installations and discussing distribution methods. General Motors placed a car at his disposal during his time at Brisbane.

Maclean (Inspector of Taxes) v. Trembath.

They then went via Sydney (where they spent two days with friends) to Albury, where they stayed five days with a cousin, and where the taxpayer visited an abattoir and another installation.

They then spent four or five days at Melbourne, staying with another brother, where the taxpayer spent two days at a General Motors factory (accompanied on one day by his wife).

They then spent three days on a private visit at Hobart.

They then returned via Melbourne and Albury to Sydney where they stayed five days with friends, and where the taxpayer spent one day (unaccompanied by his wife) in final talks with General Motors officials. They then embarked for the United Kingdom.

The journey from Brisbane to Sydney was by car, and took four days, the nights being spent at hotels. The journey from Albury to Melbourne was by a borrowed car. The final journey in Australia from Melbourne to Sydney was by car as far as Albury and then by train. The other journeys were by air.

The cost of the sea passages to and from Australia for the taxpayer and his wife was £730, which sum was paid by the company. The taxpayer had kept no detailed records of his expenditure in Australia and on board ship. Ths Special Commissioners found that he had expended £200 on air travel (excluding the cost of the return journey from Melbourne to Hobart which was a private journey) and £50 on hotel accommodation; he spent a further £240 during the whole period of four and a half months, which he was unable to account for in any detail. All these moneys (£490 in all) were provided by the company.

On his visits to General Motors installations at Sydney, Brisbane and Melbourne the taxpayer and his wife spent more time in discussions with General Motors staff than in inspecting plant. The discussions ranged over what they sold, how they sold it, and why. He learned that they sold things in Australia which had never been used in England. These discussions were very useful to him as director of the company, as he learned a great deal which he could not have learned otherwise. The knowledge and experience he acquired had enabled him to do business better and in consequence the company had got business which it would not otherwise have got.

The tour cost the company £1,220 and if the company could increase its turnover by about £5,000 in any one year, it would get that £1,220 back.

The following table showed the company's annual turnover since it commenced business:

Year to January 31.
1948	£ 49,730	1952	£133,640
1949	£ 71,489	1953	£113,954
1950	£109,825	1954	£121,901
1951	£118,283	1955	£132,624

The taxpayer was not able to say specifically that the increased turnover for the year to January 31, 1955, was due to his Australian visit; in that period some of Frigidaire's authorized dealers had a reduced turnover.

The commissioners found on consideration of the whole of the evidence that "the expenditure of the taxpayer on sea "passages, on his travel in Australia (excluding the journey to "and from Hobart on a private visit), and on his hotel accommo- "dation, was incurred wholly, exclusively and necessarily in the "performance of his duties as director of the company" . . . i.e., they found that one moiety of the £730, one moiety of the £200 and one moity of the £50, had been wholly, exclusively and necessarily incurred in the performance of the taxpayer's duties as a director of the company.

"As regards the expenditure on the sea passages, travel in "Australia (excluding the journey to and from Hobart) and "hotel accommodation of the . . . [taxpayer's] wife [i.e., the "other moiety of those sums] we had rather more doubt, but "on the balance of the evidence we found that this also was "expended wholly, exclusively and necessarily in the perform- "ance of the duties of her office. As regards the rest of the "moneys expended by the appellant [the taxpayer] in the course "of his visit to Australia, we found (in the absence of any firm "evidence to the contrary) that it was not expended wholly "exclusively and necessarily in the performance of the duties of "the appellant's office.

"Accordingly we held that the appellant was entitled to a "deduction under paragraph 7 of the Ninth Schedule to the "Income Tax Act, 1952, of the cost of the sea passages"—for himself and his wife—"(£730), the cost of the travel in "Australia as aforesaid (£200) and the cost of hotel accom- "modation (£50) making £980 in all. We disallowed the "remaining expenditure, i.e., £240."

The Crown appealed in relation to the allowance of £980 as a deductible expense; there was no cross-appeal by the taxpayer.

Maclean (Inspector of Taxes) v. Trembath.

Roxburgh J., having stated the facts, continued: First of all, I will consider the husband's case, that is to say, the expenditure attributable to the husband. If the finding of the commissioners stands, rule 7 has been complied with so far as his expenditure is concerned. It has not been contended before me that his visit was wholly, or even partly, for the purposes of visiting relations or having a holiday. That would certainly have been a possible finding, but that has not been contended and I may well believe for good and sufficient reasons. It might not have helped the Crown even if they had succeeded on that contention. What is said is that the husband went to improve his "personal equipment." That might have been a possible finding, but I think it unlikely. The real question is whether he did not go primarily for personal reasons.

However that may be, there was evidence before the commissioners pointing in more than one direction, and, having heard him examined and cross-examined (which I have not done), they made a finding of fact which was open to them on the evidence. I cannot interfere, and their finding stands.

But I cannot take the same view with regard to the wife. It is, in my view, a fallacy to suppose that, if the husband's expenses are allowable, the wife's are necessarily allowable too. I am not saying that anybody actually supposed that, but the case seems to have been conducted before the Special Commissioners somewhat on that tacit assumption.

Some of the contrasts may be considered. The taxpayer's fees as director of Trembath & Co. Ltd. were £5,000; the wife's fees as director of the company were £480. She never attended the company's premises at all in the year in question; she had no technical qualifications. Unlike the taxpayer, she did not attend and submit herself for cross-examination and, therefore, the Special Commissioners and I stand in the same position in that regard. I attach great importance to that; I doubt if I should have done what I am going to do had she given evidence and been cross-examined and they had accepted her evidence, but she did not.

The only thing found that might be said to be an asset about her is that she was a good conversationalist, and I find great difficulty in seeing what value that could have in connexion with a woman who did not attend the business premises at all during the year of assessment, making a visit to Australia, a country in which the company was debarred from selling its products. Moreover, it was conceded by the husband that, so far as he was concerned, he was to some extent influenced by the desire to see his family; no doubt that, so far as he was concerned, was qualified by a "but" of importance and the "but" was apparently accepted as paramount by the Special Commissioners, but there is no such qualification in connexion with the wife. Indeed, nothing is said as to whether she wanted to see her relations by marriage, nor is anything said about what I should have thought was her natural desire to accompany her husband on the very pleasant trip to the country of his birth where many of his relations were established; nothing is said about that at all.

Even so, I might have hesitated to reverse this finding of the commissioners if any sort of explanation had been given as to what she was supposed to be doing in Australia on behalf of the company, but there is not a word about that. I am, of course, drawing a distinction between her and her husband; there is plenty of evidence as to what he was doing in Australia, but I cannot find any evidence of what she was doing. The fact that she visited some three or four places and took part in some discussions seems to me to be altogether too vague to give me any real assistance at all.

The one thing of which I am quite certain is that the finding of the commissioners is wrong in so far as it is said that the expenditure on her behalf was expended wholly and exclusively in the performance of the duties of her office; that is quite an impossible finding on the evidence before me. But that does not mean—and this is where the case has caused me quite a little difficulty—that the expenditure may not have been necessarily incurred in the performance of the duties of her office. I am inclined to think that the Special Commissioners must have there misread the rule in relation to travelling expenses. I am not going to treat the £50 for hotel expenses as a separate item because it only looks like stopping a night or two in the course of a journey and, for practical purposes, it is fairly to be treated as travelling expenses and not, as it would be if it had been for a long period of time, something quite different.

The rule in regard to travelling expenses contains nothing about "wholly" or "exclusively"; what it says is: "If the "holder of an office or employment of profit is necessarily obliged "to incur and defray out of the emoluments thereof the expenses "of travelling in the performance of the duties of the office or "employment . . ." There is nothing about "wholly and "exclusively" at all; that comes in the later part of the rule which seems to be directed to things other than travelling expenses. I think that the Special Commissioners must have omitted to notice that because of the form of their finding: they do not in terms refer to it at all.

The first contention which was put before me on behalf of the wife's expenses arises out of the complicated legislation which now affects the matter, and particularly section 161 of the Income Tax Act, 1952. I have already mentioned that this ticket to Australia, which is a substantial and quite the largest item, was purchased and paid for by the company. It would not be treated as an emolument at all if it fell within the first subsection of section 162 of the Income Tax Act of 1952, because that subsection says: "Any expense incurred by a body corporate in the "acquisition or production of an asset which remains its own

Maclean (Inspector of Taxes) v. Trembath.

Roxburgh J.

"property shall be left out of account for the purposes of the "last preceding section."

I am afraid I cannot regard the benefits or facilities conferred by that ticket as falling within the exception in section 162. It seems to me that it plainly falls within the ambit of section 161, that is to say, provision of benefits or facilities, and, therefore, is properly to be treated as an emolument. This point was not taken before the Special Commissioners, but was taken with leave before me and I reject it. This being, therefore, an emolument, it is plain that it would be allowable as a deduction if the wife was necessarily obliged to incur and defray out of the benefits or facilities the expense of travelling in the performance of the duties of her office or employment.

There is a grave danger in a lax construction of that part of that rule, and I will give an example of what I mean: if a public company, acting with all proper formalities, required a director to travel to Australia for the performance of one single duty occupying but a single day, I feel no doubt that the whole of the passage money would be allowable as a deduction, notwithstanding that he spent several further months in Australia doing nothing but visiting his friends and relations. After a good deal of discussion, I think that Mr. Heyworth Talbot was prepared to accept that as the right construction of this rule, but, whether he accepted it or not, that is, in my view, the right construction, and it only shows how careful one must be to see that the person claiming the allowance was really performing the duties of the office, otherwise the opportunities for swindling would be vast, especially in the case of a "man-and-wife" company in which nobody is interested as a shareholder except the man and his wife.

Having satisfied myself that the finding of the commissioners that the expenditure was wholly and exclusively expended for the purposes of the company's business is wrong, I do not feel unduly saddled by their finding that it was "necessarily expended," because their finding must, I think, be treated as a whole, and if two of its ingredients fall out it is difficult to postulate that the remaining ingredient must necessarily be allowed to stand, though, of course, it may or may not be right. But being satisfied that there was no evidence at all that the expenditure, so far as the wife was concerned, was incurred wholly and exclusively in the performance of her duties as a director, I do not feel much embarrassed by the circumstance that they also found that it was "necessarily" incurred, especially as I think that they have adopted the wrong approach to this problem.

I suppose that everybody connected with income tax administration knows that nowadays a director's expenses are dealt with under paragraph 7 of the Rules applicable to Schedule E (9th Schedule), but perhaps not everybody has realized what different problems arise in the course of doing so. It is not that the words bear any different meaning, but the application of the words to directors introduces problems which never arise in connexion with somebody whose duties are quite clearly regulated either by contract or by statute or otherwise. That the wife was a director is not in question. In order to ascertain her duties the first thing, in logical sequence, is to look at the articles of association of the company. That apparently nobody did, but that probably does not matter because almost certainly they were more or less in common form, in which case the duties would not be in any way specifically defined; they would only be defined in quite broad and general language with perhaps certain things expressly prohibited. Although, therefore, that would logically have been the proper starting-point of the inquiries, its absence causes me no embarrassment.

The next thing that has to be remembered in connexion with directors is that their duties are seldom stereotyped, and that one cannot find out what a director's duties are without studying the resolutions of the directors which ought to be recorded in the minute book of the company. Whether any resolutions were ever recorded in the minute book of this company I do not know, because I have no information about them; but that must be the proper foundation for the search for the answer to the question what are the duties of a particular director. If there had been in this minute book, and it had been proved, a resolution of the board of directors requesting her to go to Australia for some purpose specified in the resolution, then I should have been prepared to say that this expenditure ought to have been allowed, unless the Crown were able to show that the resolution was not passed in good faith. In the case of a " one-man " or " man-and-" wife " company that can sometimes be shown, but prima facie the resolution would be treated as genuine and construed according to its tenor, though it might be displaced on the ground that it was not bona fide. Nothing of that sort is suggested in this case. There is no direct statement that the company ever requested this lady to go to Australia at all, which is not without importance considering that she was the wife of the appellant. It may be that he did, but non constat that he did it on behalf of the company.

There is no suggestion as to the function she was to perform in Australia anywhere in the case and that, I should have thought, was quite inevitable if a company bona fide sends somebody from England to Australia, especially when they have no business connexions with Australia, as in the present case. The company must surely give them some sort of directions before they start as to what they are to do in Australia or, at any rate, send them out by telegraph, and there is no suggestion that any directions were ever given to her at all.

There is again no evidence retrospectively as to what she did, in fact, do for the company. That there was a business element in her visit I am prepared to concede, I think that there was; but it is ill defined, and in my judgment that falls very far short of showing that this expenditure was in the performance of the duties of her office of director. I must therefore reverse the finding of the commissioners in regard to the expenditure on behalf of the wife and say that there was no evidence that this expenditure was necessarily incurred in the performance of the duties of her office of director. The reason why I think that the commissioners used the word "necessarily" was partly because they were able to find—as I could not possibly do—that she was wholly and exclusively performing the duties of that office in Australia and partly because, as I think, they did not make the right approach to the question which is: what are the duties of the office of a director?

Maclean (Inspector of Taxes) v. Trembath.

Roxburgh J.

Accordingly, I allow the appeal in part, that is to say, I allow it in so far as it relates to one moiety of the sum in question, being the expenditure on behalf of the wife, and reject it qua the other.

Appeal allowed in part.

*GOODY v. BARING.

[1955 G. 1442.]

Solicitor—Negligence—Sale of land—Solicitor acting for both parties—Parts of property let to tenants—No inquiry as to standard or recoverable rent—Standard of skill and care required.

Barrister—Chancery Division—Common law counsel—Desirability of briefing Chancery practitioners.

On a sale and purchase of leasehold property of which the first and second floors were each subject to a tenancy at 25s. a week, a solicitor, at the purchaser's suggestion, acted for both parties. He used a printed form of "Enquiries before contract," containing, inter alia, a request for full particulars of all subsisting tenancies. It did not contain any questions about standard or recoverable rents. In an interview with the vendor the solicitor noted the answers: "Top floor let to [name] 25s. per week inclusive. This was the "rent receivable when the vendor bought in 1948 (?) and no "increases have been passed on to tenant. First floor let to [name] "25s. per week ditto. Ground floor let to vendor from 1947 to 1948 "at 35s. per week inclusive. No information of previous lettings." He did not ask the vendor about the standard rents or about the recoverable rents. He prepared in duplicate a contract which stated that the property was sold with vacant possession of the ground floor and garden but subject to tenancies of the first and second floors at 25s. each. The purchaser called at the solicitor's office to sign his part and the solicitor went through the inquiries with him and told him that he could possibly increase the rents as there had been no increase since 1950 although the rates had gone up. Some time after completion a proposed increase in the rents was refused on behalf of one of the tenants by solicitors who had quite easily ascertained that in 1939 both floors were let for a total rent of 30s. a week and that the rates for the whole house had been increased by only 10s. a week. In proceedings by both tenants the county court fixed the standard rent for each of the two floors at 15s. and, with the permitted increases, the recoverable rents at 17s. 6d., and 18s. 4d. a week, so that the purchaser had to refund to the tenants the excess payments which they had made to him.

In an action against the solicitor for damages for breach of his duty as solicitor to the purchaser, the purchaser alleged that the defendant had not ascertained or sufficiently tried to ascertain what the recoverable rents were and had not advised the purchaser that the rents being received might be more than the recoverable rents:—

Held, (1) that the amount of standard or recoverable rent must be a subject for inquiry by a solicitor acting for a purchaser, and a subject on which plain and clear advice might be required from that solicitor to his client; (2) that by accepting insufficient information from the vendor, without further questions or inquiries in other directions, and by failing to inform his client that there might have been overpayments, the defendant had been guilty of negligence.

Observations of Scrutton L.J. in Moody v. Cox [1917] 2 Ch. 71, 91, on the unwisdom of a solicitor involving himself in conflicting duties by acting for both parties in a vendor and purchaser transaction considered and applied.

Per curiam. Even though preliminary inquiries have been made before contract, it is still the duty of a purchaser's solicitor to make the appropriate requisitions and inquiries after the formal contract is signed, even if the preliminary inquiries have been so complete that it is only necessary to ask whether the former answers are still complete and accurate.

ACTION.

The facts are stated in the judgment.

C. P. Harvey Q.C. and J. P. Brookes for the plaintiff.

Patrick M. O'Connor for the defendant.

The cases cited in argument are referred to in the judgment.

DANCKWERTS J. This is an action for negligence by a purchaser of land against the solicitor who acted for him in respect of the purchase. The case turns entirely on matters of conveyancing practice. Only one of the three counsel who appear before me practices habitually in the Chancery Division. The common law counsel appearing in the case are, of course, thoroughly competent in regard to the matters coming within the ambit of their ordinary practice, and are well known to me. But I must observe that their experience in respect of conveyancing matters does not seem to me to be such as to provide me with much assistance in regard to the matters which I have to decide. Of course, it is not the counsel concerned who are to blame for this situation.

In 1953 the plaintiff, who was employed as a clerk by a firm of radio manufacturers, saw an advertisement relating to property known as 36 Cecile Park, Hornsey, and he got in touch with the owner, a Mr. Tebbs. On October 12, 1953, he paid Mr. Tebbs a deposit of £100, in respect of the purchase price of £1,000, and a receipt was given to him, which was expressed to be received "subject to signing of contract."

Goody v. Baring.

The property was leasehold, held under a lease for the term of 99 years from December 25, 1882, at an annual rent of £9. The plaintiff was told that the two upper floors were let to tenants at 25s. a week each. The plaintiff's intention was himself to occupy the ground floor at some future date, though not immediately, but I think that it is clear that he regarded the purchase partly as an investment. He was anxious to complete by the following January 1, but otherwise there was no special urgency.

On the same day, October 12, 1953, the plaintiff wrote a letter asking the defendant, whom he had met through his (the plaintiff's) employers, to act for him. The defendant accepted these instructions. Unfortunately, he also agreed to act for Mr. Tebbs, the vendor. This is not a case in which an inexperienced purchaser has been tempted by a vendor to employ the vendor's solicitor. It was the plaintiff himself who gave the defendant's name to Mr. Tebbs and suggested that instructions should be given to him also by Mr. Tebbs, who was in fact known to the defendant as a tree feller.

But this does not make the position any more satisfactory. It seems to me practically impossible for a solicitor to do his duty to each client properly when he tries to act for both a vendor and a purchaser. The position has been pointed out very plainly by Scrutton L.J. in Moody v. Cox[1]: "It may be that a solicitor "who tries to act for both parties puts himself in such a position "that he must be liable to one or the other, whatever he does. "The case has been put of a solicitor acting for vendor and "purchaser who knows of a flaw in the title by reason of his "acting for the vendor, and who, if he discloses that flaw in the "title which he knows as acting for the vendor, may be liable "to an action by his vendor, and who, if he does not disclose "the flaw in the title, may be liable to an action by the "purchaser for not doing his duty as solicitor for him. It "will be his fault for mixing himself up with a transaction in "which he has two entirely inconsistent interests, and solicitors "who try to act for both vendors and purchasers must appreciate "that they run a very serious risk of liability to one or the other "owing to the duties and obligations which such curious relation "puts upon them."

It is nearly forty years since those words were said by Scrutton L.J., and it appears that they have still not been properly appreciated by some solicitors. Perhaps they have never been read by many of them.

[1] [1917] 2 Ch. 71, 91.

The defendant obtained the documents of title from Mr. Tebbs' bank, and from these it appeared that Mr. Tebbs had acquired the property by an assignment dated June 16, 1950, from a Mr. Edwin Hayes Johnson, who had acquired the property by an assignment dated September 15, 1933.

On November 11, 1953, the defendant saw Mr. Tebbs with the object of obtaining information from him. The defendant had with him a printed form of "Enquiries before contract," sold by a well-known firm of law stationers, and on this form he noted in pencil the answers which he obtained from Mr. Tebbs. Questions 1 (a) and (b) are in the following form: "1. Please "supply full particulars of: (a) All subsisting tenancies, stating "which are or have been statutory tenancies, either under the "Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1933, "or under the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, "1939, all terms of the tenancies, and the names of the tenants, "together with copies of any leases or agreements. (b) If the "property is now in the vendor's possession, or vacant, or the "present tenancy is not a statutory tenancy, please state whether "the property is, or has been, subject to the Rent Restrictions "Acts, and if so the amounts of the statutory and net rents, and "whether the property or any part of it was registered as "decontrolled with a local authority."

Against these questions, the defendant wrote down the following information: "Top floor let to Mr. Chapman 25s. per week "inclusive. This was the rent receivable when the vendor bought "in 1948 (?) and no increases have been passed on to tenant. "First floor let to Mr. Hommerton 25s. per week ditto. Ground "floor let to vendor from 1947 to 1948 at 35s. per week inclusive. "No information of previous lettings." It seems probable that the defendant had not examined the documents of title at this date. Against a certain number of the other questions in the form the defendant also made some pencil notes.

The defendant then proceeded to prepare a contract in duplicate incorporating the National Conditions of Sale (15th edition) with some special conditions of sale. But, as the property was registered with good leasehold title, the matter was comparatively simple. One condition states that the property is sold with vacant possession on completion, but it appears that as a result of a telephone conversation with the vendor this was altered by the defendant so as to limit it to the ground floor and garden, and a reference to the first and second floors being let at the inclusive weekly rentals of 25s. each floor was added. Completion on December 18, 1953, was provided for.

In response to a request by the defendant on November 23, 1953, the plaintiff called on the defendant to sign his part of the contract. According to the plaintiff's account, the defendant had the unsigned contract in front of him, and also the preliminary inquiries (but upside down from the plaintiff's point of view, and in any event the pencil notes are difficult to read). The plaintiff says that the defendant went through the inquiries, but rather for his own satisfaction, it seemed, than for the purpose of informing the plaintiff. The plaintiff says that the defendant remarked that it was possible that the plaintiff could increase the rents, as no increase had been made since 1950 although rates had gone up. The defendant passed the contract over to the plaintiff to sign. The plaintiff says that the defendant did not go through the terms of the contract with him, though he did give him every opportunity to read it. The plaintiff thought he was with the defendant for about three-quarters of an hour.

Goody v. Baring.

Danckwerts J.

The defendant, in his evidence, said that he went through all the relevant documents with the plaintiff; that he read the replies which he had noted on the form "Enquiries before "contract" out loud; that he remarked to the plaintiff how difficult the situation under the Rent Acts was becoming, and that the standard rents were very hard to establish; that he probably did tell the plaintiff that, as increases of rates had not been passed on, it was possible he might get an increase of rents. He also says that he told the plaintiff that the rents might be reduced. He said that the plaintiff seemed to understand and was not much concerned.

As to what took place on this occasion, I think I must accept the plaintiff's story. He appeared to me to be an exceptionally honest and frank witness, and he stood up to a very severe cross-examination without being shaken and without fencing. He was said to be a business man, but he was obviously not a man who dealt often with land, and he seemed to have no more than the average knowledge of "the man in the street" that rents of houses had been "pegged" by the Rent Acts.

I am far from suggesting that the defendant was not an honest witness. But it seemed to me that his evidence was based not so much on his actual recollection as on what he thought his usual practice was, and what he would be likely to have done, and he suffered, as it seems to me, from a certain amount of "happy "hindsight." It must also be borne in mind that to a solicitor who does one hundred conveyancing matters in a year a particular transaction is merely one of many, while to the client his case is the only one he has had to bother about.

The contracts were signed and dated November 24, 1953, and the sale was completed on January 1, 1954. The defendant charged a reduced fee.

The trouble came in June, 1954. In May the plaintiff proposed to raise the rents of the two tenants by reason of increases in the rates. This drew a letter dated June 3 from the solicitors for Mr. Chapman (one of the tenants) refusing to pay an increase, and instead demanding a reduction. Apparently with very little trouble they had discovered that in 1939 the whole of the first and second floors were let for 30s. a week, and increases of rates amounted to no more than 10s. a week for the whole house. Proceedings were started in the county court on July 14, 1954.

and eventually on September 9, 1954, the standard rent was fixed by that court as being 15s. per week for each of the two floors, and, with the permitted increases, the recoverable rents were 17s. 6d. per week and 18s. 4d. per week. The consequence was that the plaintiff had to make refunds to the tenants.

The standard on which a solicitor's liability for negligence depends has recently been described by Harman J., and his remarks have been approved by the Court of Appeal in Simmons v. Pennington & Son (a firm).[2] In that case Harman J., as quoted by Hodson L.J., said: "I do not think I need deal at "any great length with the question of a solicitor's liability for "negligence. It is the same as anybody else's liability; having "regard to the degree of skill held out to the public by solicitors, "does the conduct of the solicitor fall short of the standard which "the public has been led to expect of the solicitor?"

It is plain that the standard of skill and care required of a solicitor who acts for both parties on a sale and purchase is at least as great as that which would be required of a solicitor who acts for a purchaser alone.

Now in the present case the purchaser was buying a property let to two tenants who were in occupation as regards part of the property—the first and second floors. They were paying weekly rents, and the rateable value of the whole property (£44 a year) showed that the property was likely to be subject to the provisions of the Rent Acts. When that situation is present, the amount of the standard rent is an important fact to be ascertained if possible, because on it depends the amounts of the rents which are lawfully recoverable from the tenants concerned. There have been plenty of cases where the rents have been found to have been unlawfully raised and the owner of the property has had to refund: see, for example, Kitchen's Trustee v. Madders.[3]

It seems to me that the amount of the standard rent must be (1) a subject for inquiry by the solicitor acting for the purchaser, and (2) a subject on which plain and clear advice may be required from that solicitor to his client. The question is whether these duties were properly performed by the defendant in the present case.

So far as I can tell, the question what were the standard rents was not put to the vendor in the present case. The form of "Enquiries before contract" seems to be curiously defective in this respect. Question 1 (a), which relates to tenancies, does not mention the standard, or statutory, or recoverable rents at all. The defendant was told by the vendor that the rents of 25s. a week were receivable when he bought, that no increases had been passed on and that he had no information as to previous lettings. The defendant thereupon was content with this meagre information, and apparently made no further inquiry of the vendor.

I cannot help thinking that a solicitor who knew his duty, and was not hampered by acting for both vendor and purchaser, would have pursued the subject more vigorously. Of course, the vendor or his solicitors might then have replied that to the best of the vendor's information and belief the recoverable rent was 25s. a week or they might have replied that the vendor had no further information. But should then the purchaser's solicitor do nothing further in the matter? I do not believe that his duty is then completed. For instance, in Hunt v. Luck[4] it was held that the occupation of land by a tenant affects a purchaser of the land with constructive notice of all that tenant's rights, though not of the lessor's title or rights. The deduction from this case surely is that in the course of his investigation of the title the purchaser's solicitor should inquire of the tenants the terms on which they occupy the property; and in a case which is affected by the Rent Acts the inquiries should include an inquiry whether the rents they pay are the standard or the recoverable rents of the property.

In the present case the promptness of the tenants' reaction to the plaintiff's attempt to raise their rents suggests that such inquiries as I have mentioned would have either revealed the information which was vital or sources from which the necessary information could be obtained. I reject the contention of counsel for the defendant that the readiness with which the information was later obtained has no relevance on the question of the defendant's negligence. The defendant, I may observe, was not aware of the case of Hunt v. Luck.[5]

By accepting the insufficient information given by the vendor, Mr. Tebbs, without further questioning or inquiries in other directions, in my view the defendant failed in his duty to his client. It is, in my view, no excuse for failure that inquiries may be troublesome to make. Neglect to make the inquiries may often result in no adverse claim. But when trouble occurs it does not seem to me to be sufficient answer to say that a chance is often taken by those whose duty it is to investigate.

However, evidence was called on behalf of the defendant, with the object of showing that the defendant's indifference on the subject of the standard or recoverable rents was in accordance with the usual practice of solicitors, and, therefore, not open to criticism so as to justify an allegation of negligence.

Three solicitors were called for this purpose. They were (1) the defendant himself; (2) the solicitor who acted on the occasion of the acquisition of the property by Mr. Tebbs from Mr. Johnson; and (3) a member of the firm of solicitors instructing counsel on behalf of the defendant. I am sure that all three are perfectly respectable solicitors, but I should not describe them as being independent and uninterested in regard to the matters raised by this action.

Counsel for the defendant contended that I was bound to accept their evidence on the question of the proper practice in these matters, and (if I understood him correctly) I was not at liberty to draw upon my own conveyancing experience or reach conclusions from cases such as Hunt v. Luck,[6] which would suggest that their practices were below standard. This I cannot accept. As to the evidence in question, the defendant no doubt was bound to say that he acted in accordance with his usual practice and that that practice was in accordance with usual conveyancing standards. I am not satisfied that the evidence of the other two solicitors wholly supported him. Mr. Frank Wilders said that, unless the vendor had absolute information, his solicitors would answer inquiries by saying "so far as they "were aware." He said that it really depends on each case what one does. If it is a case of a dealer, one takes more care as it is for an investment. But why should other purchasers suffer from a lower standard of care? He said he would ask supplementary questions of the vendor's solicitors and if he could get no more he would put the onus on his client, the purchaser. He agreed that if the owner in 1939 was known, there was nothing to prevent inquiries being made of him. But he had not heard of inquiries being made of tenants. When he acted on the occasion of Mr. Tebbs's purchase in 1950, it was very easy for him as there was never any proper contract and there was a quick conveyance. Mr. Tebbs knew the situation and was satisfied.

Mr. William Wadsworth Teggin said that vendors give the information which they have and usually qualify it—by words like "so far as the vendors" knew, I think he meant. He said it was not unusual to get information from which standard rents or recoverable rents could not be ascertained. He said that one tells one's client or inquires again of the vendor. He had heard of tenants or former tenants being asked for information, and he agreed that if the 1939 owner was known it would be right to make inquiries of him.

It seems to me that the inquiries made by the defendant fell below even the standards mentioned by these witnesses.

So far as putting the matter up to the client (in the absence of satisfactory information) is concerned, I am not satisfied that the defendant advised the plaintiff in such a way as to make him understand that the amounts of 25s. a week paid by the tenants could not be relied upon as recoverable rents, and might involve the plaintiff in possible demands for repayment of amounts of rent overpaid. On the contrary, I think that the defendant spoke to the plaintiff only of possible increases.

In my view, therefore, the defendant was guilty of negligence in that he made inadequate inquiries on the subject of the standard or recoverable rents of the upper floors of the property, and he did not clearly advise the plaintiff that so little was known on this subject that there might have been overpayments. I do not believe that the question of overpayments occurred to the defendant, any more than it did to the plaintiff at the time of the contract.

Goody v. Baring.

Danckwerts J.

There is one final remark that I have to make. Counsel for the defendant seemed to contend that when preliminary inquiries before contract have been made there is no obligation on the purchaser's solicitor to make requisitions and any necessary searches or inquiries after the contract has been signed. This is not correct. The practice of making preliminary inquiries has grown up, no doubt, because a sale "subject to contract," involving a subsequent formal contract, has become a common occurrence, and the provisions in the Law of Property Act, 1925, as to constructive or imputed notice have increased the troubles of an intending purchaser. But it is still the duty of a purchaser's solicitor to make the appropriate requisitions and inquiries after the formal contract is signed, even if the preliminary inquiries have been so complete that it is only necessary to ask whether the answers thus received are still complete and accurate.

In the result the action succeeds.

* SUBRAMANIAM KADIRTAMBY SUBRAMANIAM . . . . . Appellant;

AND

THE QUEEN . . . . . Respondent.

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF CEYLON.

Ceylon—Criminal law—Perjury—Summary statutory powers of court—Subsidiary investigation against witnesses during trial—Misconceived procedure—Criminal Procedure Code (Legislative Enactments of Ceylon, 1938 Rev., c. 16), s. 440 (1) (4).

Privy Council—Costs of appeal—Criminal case—Special circumstances.

By section 440 of the Criminal Procedure Code of Ceylon: "(1) If any person giving evidence on any subject in open court

"in any judicial proceeding under this Code gives, in the opinion "of the court before which the judicial proceeding is held, false "evidence within the meaning of section 188 of the Penal Code it "shall be lawful for the court, if such court be the Supreme Court, "summarily to sentence such witness as for a contempt of the "court to imprisonment . . . for any period not exceeding three "months . . . (4) In lieu of exercising the power given by this "section the court may if it thinks fit transmit the record of the "judicial proceeding to the Attorney-General to enable him to "exercise the powers conferred on him by this Code or proceed in "manner provided by section 380."

During the course of a trial for alleged murder the judge, a Commissioner of Assize of the Supreme Court of Ceylon, being apparently of the opinion that evidence of the murder was being suppressed, on his own initiative called a number of the witnesses and cross-examined them and the prosecution witnesses not in connexion with the alleged murder but in connexion with the alleged suppression of evidence of that murder. In the course of that cross-examination he formed the opinion that the appellant, who was a village headman, and some of the police and other witnesses were committing perjury, and he proceeded to direct the acquittal of the prisoner although he stated that he had not the slightest doubt that he was guilty and that he had with the assistance of the police and of the appellant suppressed the evidence. At a later hearing the commissioner, after hearing counsel for the police and other witnesses and the appellant, in purported exercise of the summary power vested in him under section 440 (1) of the Criminal Procedure Code, sentenced them to varying terms of imprisonment. On appeal by the appellant:—

Held, that the course taken by the commissioner was misconceived. The summary power conferred by section 440 (1) was one which should only be used when it was clear beyond doubt that a witness in the course of his evidence in the case being tried had committed perjury. It was never intended that in the exercise of the power under section 440 (1) in the course of a criminal trial a subsidiary criminal investigation should be set on foot not against the prisoner charged but against the witnesses in the case. If such an investigation was necessary it could and should be set on foot under section 440 (4).

In all the circumstances this was a case in which it was right to make the unusual order that the appellant should have his costs of the appeal and of the petition for special leave.

Order of the Commissioner of Assize set aside.

APPEAL (No. 20 of 1955), by special leave, against an order of a Commissioner of Assize of the Supreme Court of Ceylon (Mr. Commissioner Barr Kumarakulasinghe) (March 18, 1954), whereby the appellant was sentenced to one month's rigorous imprisonment for having given false evidence during the course of a trial for a murder on November 27, 1952, before the commissioner who, in sentencing the appellant, purported to exercise the summary powers vested in him under section 440 (1) of the Criminal Procedure Code of Ceylon.

The appellant had served the said sentence before the hearing of this appeal.

By section 440 of the Criminal Procedure Code: "(1) If any "person giving evidence on any subject in open court in any " judicial proceeding under this Code gives, in the opinion of the " court before which the judicial proceeding is held, false evidence " within the meaning of section 188 of the Penal Code it shall be " lawful for the court, if such court be the Supreme Court, " summarily to sentence such witness as for a contempt of the " court to imprisonment either simple or rigorous for any period " not exceeding three months or to fine such witness in any sum " not exceeding two hundred rupees; or if such court be an " inferior court to order such witness to pay a fine not exceeding " fifty rupees and in default of payment of such fine to undergo " rigorous imprisonment for any period not exceeding two months. " Whenever the power given by this section is exercised by a " court other than the Supreme Court the judge or magistrate of " such court shall record the reasons for imposing such fine.

" (2) Any person who has undergone any sentence of imprison- " ment or paid any fine imposed under this section shall not be " liable to be punished again for the same offence.

" (3) Any person against whom any order is made by any " court other than the Supreme Court under subsection (1) of this " section may appeal to the Supreme Court and every such appeal " shall be subject to the provisions of this Code.

" (4) In lieu of exercising the power given by this section the " court may if it thinks fit transmit the record of the judicial " proceeding to the Attorney-General to enable him to exercise " the powers conferred on him by this Code or proceed in manner " provided by section 380.

" (5) Nothing in this section contained shall be construed as " derogating from or limiting the powers and jurisdiction of the " Supreme Court or the judges thereof."

The appellant was sentenced in the following circumstances: The accused man, one Verrakathey Tharuman alias Tharmalingam, was charged under section 296 of the Penal Code with the murder of one Kandasamy on November 27, 1952, at or near a road junction known as Nelliadi Junction.

The appellant was at that time the village headman of Karavetti North, a village which abutted on the north side of Nelliadi Junction which was the scene of the offence. The village of Karavetti West abutted on the south side of Nelliadi Junction.

The case for the prosecution appeared to have been that the deceased was seriously assaulted and beaten by the accused and two others (who were not before the court) on the north side of Nelliadi Junction soon after it had become dark (that was, about 6.30–7 p.m.). His assailants left the injured man lying on the road where he was attacked, but subsequently he was removed to the southern side of the Junction by two innocent persons, who placed him under a tamarind tree. After the attack the attackers went away, but the accused returned shortly after and, finding the injured person under the tree, attacked him again, this time with a knife. The injured man died as a result of the injuries he had thus received.

The case for the prosecution was supported principally by the evidence of two alleged eye-witnesses and by the evidence of police officers and others (the appellant among them) who had either assisted at the police investigation or otherwise had played some part therein.

The appellant was called for the prosecution and testified that he was not an eye-witness nor in possession of information which definitely identified any person with the crime. He was first informed of the offence at about 7.30 p.m. on the day in question and within 10 minutes or so of his receiving such information he went to Nelliadi Junction. On his arrival at the junction he found the injured man alive but gravely wounded lying under a tree within the jurisdiction of the Karavetti West headman in whose absence he (the appellant) assumed jurisdiction to deal with the emergency. He reported the offence to the police by telephone very shortly after—at about 7.45 p.m.—and until the police arrived at about 9 p.m. he carried out his duties as best he could. At about 8.15 p.m. he said he sent a written message to the Karavetti West headman asking for his car for the removal of the injured person, but the message was not accepted and was returned to him. He was unable to find the letter. The Karavetti West headman did not arrive on the scene before about 9 p.m. The appellant tried vainly to enlist the assistance of car owners for removing the injured person, who died eventually at about 8.30 p.m., that was, before the arrival of either the police or the Karavetti West headman. Later the appellant telephoned to the hospital and arranged for the removal of the deceased.

Before the arrival of the police or the Karavetti West headman he questioned, among others, one Kandappu a neighbouring boutique-keeper, and recorded his statement. The appellant stated that there was a general reluctance on the part of several persons who had been questioned to come forward with any information of the attack on the deceased. He denied that there was any truth in the suggestion that "we all of us got together "and suppressed the fact as to who the assailant was." The Karavetti West headman was not called as a witness.

April 10. The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by LORD OAKSEY, who stated the facts and statutory provisions set out above, and continued: The commissioner appears to have formed the opinion that evidence of the murder had been and was being suppressed and he therefore on his own initiative called a number of witnesses and cross-examined the prosecution witnesses and the witnesses he had called not in connexion with the alleged murder which he was trying but in connexion with the alleged suppression of evidence of that murder. In the course of this cross-examination he formed the opinion that the appellant and some of the police and other witnesses were committing perjury, and proceeded to direct the acquittal of the prisoner although he stated that he had not the slightest doubt that the prisoner was guilty and that he had, with the assistance of the police and of the appellant, suppressed the evidence. At a later hearing the commissioner, after hearing counsel for the police and other witnesses and the appellant, sentenced them to various terms of imprisonment.

In their Lordships' opinion the course taken by the commissioner was misconceived. The summary power conferred by section 440 (1) is one which should only be used when it is clear beyond doubt that a witness in the course of his evidence in the case being tried has committed perjury. It was, in their Lordships' opinion, never intended that in the exercise of the power under section 440 (1) in the course of a criminal trial a subsidiary criminal investigation should be set on foot not against the prisoner charged but against the witnesses in the case.

If such an investigation is necessary it can and should be set on foot under section 440 (4). Their Lordships will therefore humbly advise Her Majesty that the appeal should be allowed and the order of the Commissioner of Assize, Supreme Court of Ceylon, dated March 18, 1954, set aside. In all the circumstances of the case they think it right to make the unusual order that the appellant shall have his costs of the appeal and of the petition for special leave.

Denning, Morris and Parker L.JJ.

[Plaint No. R.A.L. 59.]

Contract — Exceptions clause — Negligence — Bailment — "Landing "account" including London lighterage clause exempting bailees from liability for negligence — Goods handed over to bailor in damaged state—Claim for damages for breach of implied term to take reasonable care of goods stored—Bailee found negligent without giving evidence — Sufficient notice of exceptions clause — Bailee protected by clause against claim for negligence simpliciter — Whether clause would protect bailee against claim for breach of fundamental term of or deviation from contract—Onus of proof. Shipping—London lighterage clause.

The defendant, a wholesale factor, who had had previous business dealings with the plaintiff warehousemen, delivered to them eight barrels of orange juice for storage, and a few days later received a "landing account" which on its face referred to conditions printed in small type on the back. These included the London lighterage clause, which exempted the plaintiffs, inter alia, from liability for any loss, damage or detention, in respect of goods entrusted to them in the course of their business, occasioned by the negligence, wrongful act or default of themselves, their servants, or agents. The barrels, when collected, were found to be either empty or in such damaged condition as to be useless. In an action by the warehousemen to recover charges due for storage, the defendant counterclaimed for damages for alleged breach of an implied term of the contract of bailment to take reasonable care of the barrels. The plaintiffs denied negligence and relied on the exemption clause. The county court judge, after hearing evidence for the defendant only, found that the plaintiffs had been negligent; he dismissed the counterclaim, holding that the exemption clause applied. On appeal by the defendant:—

Held, (1) that sufficient notice of the clause had been given to the defendant to make it a term of the contract.

(2) That though in the circumstances of the case the judge should not have found that the plaintiffs had been negligent, since he had not heard their evidence, they were protected by the exemption clause against what was in substance an allegation of negligence simpliciter.

Aliter, if the counterclaim had alleged that there had been deviation from or breach of a fundamental term of the contract, for that might place on the party who sought to rely on the exemption clause the burden of proving that the clause protected him.

Per Denning L.J. Exempting clauses nowadays are all held to be subject to the overriding proviso that they only avail to exempt a party when he is carrying out his contract and not when he is deviating from it or breaking it in a radical respect.

APPEAL from Judge Block, sitting in the Mayor's and City of London Court.

In June, 1953, Andrew Walter Bradshaw, trading as Bradshaw's Prescription Service, bought eight wooden casks of orange juice, containing 60 gallons each, and sent them for storage to a firm of warehousemen, J. Spurling Ltd., who, on June 10, 1953, sent a receipt for them, described as a "landing account," which stated, so far as relevant: "We have pleasure in advising you "that these goods consigned to you arrived at our premises this "day and are subject to either warehouse, wharfage, demurrage "or other charges. . . . The company's conditions as printed on "the back hereof cover the goods held in accordance with this "notice. Goods will be insured if you instruct us accordingly; "otherwise they are not insured." On the back there were "Contract conditions," and many lines of small print, which included, towards the end, the following words: "We will not "in any circumstances when acting either as warehousemen, "wharfingers, contractors, stevedores, carriers by land, or agents, "or in any other capacity, be liable for any loss, damage or "detention, howsoever, whensoever, or wheresoever occasioned "in respect of any goods entrusted to or carried or handled by "us in the course of our business, even when such loss, damage "or detention may have been occasioned by the negligence, "wrongful act or default of ourselves or our servants or agents "or others for whose acts we would otherwise be responsible."

J. Spurling Ltd. v. Bradshaw.

On the same date, June 10, 1953, the warehousemen sent an invoice to Bradshaw: "To receiving, warehousing and redelivery, "£4." There was a note at the bottom of it: "All goods are "handled by us in accordance with the conditions as over and "warehoused at owner's risk and not insured unless specially "instructed." There were no conditions "as over."

Bradshaw paid the £4 due on the invoice and for a time also paid the warehouse rent on these goods, but he afterwards fell into arrear on these and other goods. On March 9, 1954, the warehousemen sent to him an account for the balance owing by him which was, they said, rather old. Within three days, Bradshaw issued a delivery order in favour of one Tewson, a cartage contractor, directed to the warehousemen, asking them to release to him the eight barrels of orange juice; and on April 23, 1954, Tewson collected the barrels. No complaints were made in writing at that time as to the condition of the barrels when they were collected.

Meanwhile, over £60 had become due to the warehousemen in respect of rent and wharfage charges, and in spite of repeated applications in writing, the amount remained unpaid, and no reply was received from Bradshaw until, on December 17, 1954, his solicitors wrote stating that he had a counterclaim against the warehousemen for damages in respect of the storage of the barrels, this being the first written complaint on the matter.

The warehousemen thereupon issued a writ claiming the sum of £61 12s. 6d. for their charges. By his defence Bradshaw admitted the charges, but counterclaimed that the plaintiff warehousemen had agreed with him that they would accept the barrels of orange juice, store them, and subsequently deliver them at the defendant's directions to his customers; that it was an implied term of the said contract of bailment that the plaintiffs would take reasonable care of the barrels of orange juice while storing them; and that in breach of the said term and/or negligently, the plaintiffs had stored the goods in the open air and further damaged them while in their possession. By reason of the said matters, when the plaintiffs delivered the goods to a customer of the defendant, it was claimed, they were in the following condition: five barrels were empty and without lids, one barrel contained dirty water and was covered by a lid which had become loose; and two barrels were leaking badly. The defendant counterclaimed £180. By their reply to that counterclaim, the plaintiffs denied that they had been negligent, and further said that it was an express term of the contract that they should not be liable for any loss or damage of or to or in connexion with the barrels, however caused; and they relied on the term in the "landing account."

At the hearing, the counterclaim was the only matter in dispute. The cartage contractor, Tewson, was called. He said that when he collected the barrels they were at the far end of an alley-way, with lorry wheels in front of them, girders on top, and some tarpaulin sheets; and that he had later discovered that they were damaged, and spoke to the crane-driver about it. The defendant also gave evidence. He stated that he had received landing accounts from these warehousemen on many occasions; and that as soon as he saw the condition of the barrels he had gone to see the yardman at the office. He said further, that when he had received the demands for payment he had gone to see someone at the warehousemen's office and had raised the matter of the barrels. Before he was cross-examined, the judge intervened and asked his counsel: "Why is not the exempting clause "a complete answer to the case?" Having heard counsel in reply to that question, the judge, without hearing any further evidence, gave judgment in favour of the warehousemen. In his judgment he said: "I have no doubt that the plaintiffs were "negligent in looking after these barrels, and I accept the "evidence of Mr. Tewson as to their condition. . . . But this was "one of many transactions undertaken as between the plaintiffs "and the defendant for the storage of goods. Mr. Bradshaw was "most truthful and honest about the whole matter. He said "he had had lots of these landing accounts, where, on the "front is clearly printed: 'The company's conditions as printed "'on the back hereof cover the goods held in accordance with "'this notice.' Although his eyesight is not as good as it "might perhaps be, he told me that he had never taken the "trouble either to read or get anybody else to read those "conditions, and that many of those landing notes had passed "through his hands over the course of trading." The judge then referred to the exemption clause and said: "Although my eye-"sight is not as good as it used to be, I find no difficulty in

That was a finding which was not open to him, in view of the fact that Mr. Bradshaw had not been cross-examined and the warehousemen had not had an opportunity of giving their evidence. But, nevertheless, assuming that they were negligent, the question for us is whether the clause excuses the warehousemen from liability.

If the clause is taken literally, it is wide enough to exempt the company from any obligation to redeliver the goods. It would mean that if the managing director sold the orange juice to somebody else, or used it up for the company's purposes, maybe by mistake or even dishonestly, the company would not be liable; or if some discontented storeman took the bung out of a barrel and let the orange juice escape, the company still would not be liable. If the clause went to those lengths, it would be very unreasonable and might for that reason be invalid on the lines which Bramwell L.J. indicated in Parker v. South Eastern Railway Co.[1]; but I do not think that this clause is to be construed as widely as that. These exempting clauses are nowadays all held to be subject to the overriding proviso that they only avail to exempt a party when he is carrying out his contract, not when he is deviating from it or is guilty of a breach which goes to the root of it. Just as a party who is guilty of a radical breach is disentitled from insisting on the further performance by the other, so also he is disentitled from relying on an exempting clause. For instance, if a carrier by land agrees to collect goods and deliver them forthwith, and in breach of that contract he leaves them unattended for an hour instead of carrying them to their destination, with the result that they are stolen, he is disentitled from relying on the exempting clause. That was decided in 1944 by this court in Bontex Knitting Works Ltd. v. St. John's Garage,[2] expressly approving the judgment of Lewis J.[3]; or if a bailee by mistake sells the goods or stores them in the wrong place, he is not covered by the exempting clause: see the decision of McNair J. in Woolmer v. Delmer Price Ltd.[4]

The essence of the contract by a warehouseman is that he will store the goods in the contractual place and deliver them on demand to the bailor or his order. If he stores them in a different place, or if he consumes or destroys them instead of storing them, or if he sells them, or delivers them without excuse to somebody else, he is guilty of a breach which goes to the root of the contract and he cannot rely on the exempting clause. But if he should happen to damage them by some momentary piece of inadvertence, then he is able to rely on the exempting clause: because negligence by itself, without more, is not a breach which goes to the root of the contract (see Swan Hunter and Wigham Richardson Ltd. v. France Fenwick Tyne and Wear Co. Ltd., The Albion[5]), any more than non-payment by itself is such a breach: see Mersey Steel & Iron Co. v. Naylor, Benzon & Co.[6] I would not like to say, however, that negligence can never go to the root of the contract. If a warehouseman were to handle the goods so roughly as to warrant the inference that he was reckless and indifferent to their safety, he would, I think, be guilty of a breach going to the root of the contract and could not rely on the exempting clause. He cannot be allowed to escape from his obligation by saying to himself: "I am not "going to trouble about these goods because I am covered by an "exempting clause."

Another thing to remember about these exempting clauses is that in the ordinary way the burden is on the bailee to bring himself within the exception. A bailor, by pleading and presenting his case properly, can always put on the bailee the burden of proof. In the case of non-delivery, for instance, all he need plead is the contract and a failure to deliver on demand. That puts on the bailee the burden of proving either loss without his fault (which, of course, would be a complete answer at common law) or, if it was due to his fault, it was a fault from which he is excused by the exempting clause: see Cunard Steamship Co. v. Buerger[7] and Woolmer v. Delmer Price Ltd.[8] I do not think the Court of Appeal in Alderslade v. Hendon Laundry Ltd.[9] had the burden of proof in mind at all. Likewise, with goods which are returned by the bailee in a damaged condition, the burden is on him to show that the damage was done without his fault: or that, if fault there was, it was excused by the exempting clause. Nothing else will suffice. But where the only charge made in the pleadings—or the only reasonable inference on the facts—is that the damage was due to negligence and nothing more, then the bailee can rely on the exempting clause without more ado. That was, I think, the case here. As I read the pleadings, and the way the case was put to the judge, Mr. Bradshaw was complaining of negligence and nothing more. The clause therefore avails to exempt the warehousemen, provided always that it was part of the contract.

This brings me to the question whether this clause was part of the contract. Mr. Sofer urged us to hold that the warehousemen did not do what was reasonably sufficient to give notice of the conditions within Parker v. South Eastern Railway Co.[10] I quite agree that the more unreasonable a clause is, the greater the notice which must be given of it. Some clauses which I have seen would need to be printed in red ink on the face of the document with a red hand pointing to it before the notice could be held to be sufficient. The clause in this case, however, in my judgment, does not call for such exceptional treatment, especially when it is construed, as it should be, subject to the proviso that it only applies when the warehouseman is carrying out his contract, and not when he is deviating from it or breaking it in a radical respect. So construed, the judge was, I think, entitled to find that sufficient notice was given. It is to be noticed that the landing account on its face told Mr. Bradshaw that the goods would be insured if he gave instructions; otherwise they were not insured. The invoice, on its face, told him they were warehoused "at owner's risk." The printed conditions, when read subject to the proviso which I have mentioned, added little or nothing to those explicit statements taken together.

Next it was said that the landing account and invoice were issued after the goods had been received and could not, therefore, be part of the contract of bailment: but Mr. Bradshaw admitted that he had received many landing accounts before. True he had not troubled to read them. On receiving this landing account, he took no objection to it, left the goods there, and went on paying the warehouse rent for months afterwards. It seems to me that by the course of business and conduct of the parties, these conditions were part of the contract.

In these circumstances, the warehousemen were entitled to rely on this exempting condition. I think, therefore, that the counterclaim was properly dismissed, and this appeal also should be dismissed.

Morris L.J. I am of the same opinion. Although the range of the discussion in this case covered a number of important points of law, it does not seem to me that all of them in fact arise. [His Lordship referred to the terms of the counterclaim set out above, and continued:] It seems to me that that, as a pleading, is quite unexceptionable, and that what it is saying is, not "these goods were lost" or "these goods were never "delivered when a demand was made," but "The defendant "asked that these goods should be delivered to a customer of "his. They were delivered, but when delivered they were in "defective condition because of the way in which they had been "stored"; in other words, because they had been stored negligently and in breach of an implied term of the contract that the plaintiffs would take reasonable care of the barrels while storing them. Thus this case does not raise questions which might arise if there were simply a claim that goods had been asked for and had not been returned.

The judge heard the evidence of the cartage contractor as to the state of the goods when he first deposited them with the plaintiffs and their state when they were removed. The evidence of Mr. Bradshaw in chief was heard, but before he was cross-examined the judge intervened. The judge said: "I have no "doubt that the plaintiffs were negligent in looking after these "barrels." I think that the plaintiffs are entitled to have it known that, although there is that finding against them, their evidence had not been heard, although (as I say) the evidence of the carter had been heard. But the judge proceeded on the basis that there was negligence, and negligence was the case that was raised.

There was also brought into consideration the question of the conditions on the contract, and one question is whether the conditions were a part of the contract. The judge said this: "But this was one of many transactions undertaken as between "the plaintiffs and the defendant for the storage of goods. Mr. "Bradshaw was most truthful and honest about the whole matter. "He said he had had lots of these landing accounts, where, "on the front, is clearly printed: 'The company's conditions as "'printed on the back hereof cover the goods held in accordance "'with this notice.' Although his eyesight is not as good as "it might perhaps be, he told me that he had never taken the "trouble either to read or get somebody else to read those "conditions, and that many of those landing notes had passed "through his hands over the course of trading." It is true, as Mr. Sofer said, that because the evidence of the plaintiffs was not heard, there is no positive evidence that the conditions on previous landing accounts were the same as the conditions in the present case. But it is clearly established that Mr. Bradshaw knew that there were conditions. I think there can be no question that it is abundantly plain on the face of the document that there are conditions. On the face of the document the following words are plainly legible: "The company's conditions "as printed on the back hereof cover the goods held in accord-"ance with this notice. Goods will be insured if you instruct "us accordingly; otherwise they are not insured." The judge went on to say that he himself, looking at the back, could read the back; accordingly, he was finding as a matter of fact that the conditions on the back of that document were legible; and it follows, therefore, that the judge was finding as a matter of fact that the conditions were a part of the contract. In so doing, I cannot think that he is not following the line of approach to be found in a passage relied on by Mr. Sofer in the judgment of Bailhache J. in Roe v. R. A. Naylor Ltd.,[11] who said[12]: "Therefore the question in the present case is whether this "printed clause is a clause which is so printed that from its "position in the document and the size of the type an ordinary "careful business man, reading the document with reasonable "care, might miss it." It seems to me implicit in the judgment in the present case that the judge is saying: "The words are "quite clear on the face of the contract that there are conditions "on the back, and those conditions on the back are in fact "legible." Therefore, in finding that the conditions formed part of the contract, it does not seem to me that the judge was out of line with what Bailhache J. said, nor that there is anything that controverts what was said by Lush J. in Crooks v. Allan,[13] where there is another passage relied on by Mr. Sofer. It seems to me, therefore, that these conditions were a part of the contract.

[11] [1917] 1 K.B. 712.
[13] (1879) 5 Q.B.D. 38, 40.

Thus, in the present case, the question becomes whether, assuming that the goods were negligently kept by the plaintiffs, the conditions protect. It seems to me that they plainly do. In Alderslade v. Hendon Laundry Ltd.,[14] Lord Greene M.R. said[15]: "It must be remembered that a limitation clause of this "kind only applies where the damage, in respect of which the "limitation clause is operative, takes place within the four "corners of the contract. But there is no room for the applica- "tion of that principle in the present case, because there is no "material for finding that the loss of these handkerchiefs was "due to some act by the defendants outside what they had "contracted to do." In the present case, similarly, it seems to me that there is no material before us for finding that the claim results from some act of the plaintiffs outside what they contracted to do. In those circumstances, it seems to me that the conditions exempting the plaintiffs from negligence are conditions that availed, and which therefore excused the plaintiffs, even on the assumption that they had been guilty of negligence. I therefore agree that the appeal fails.

Parker L.J. I have come to the same conclusion, and would only add a few words on Mr. Sofer's last submission. He contends that even if the exemption clause is binding on the appellant, the circumstances of the loss were such that, wide as the clause is, it still may not cover the loss. That being so, it is said that the county court judge should not have stopped the case, but should have allowed the respondents to call evidence to show, if they could, that the clause applied. I confess that for myself I have seldom seen a wider clause, and it is impossible to think of any circumstances in which the loss occurred which are not covered, provided always—and this is conceded by the respondents—that there has been no breach of a fundamental term akin to deviation. Thus if, for instance, the contract had been to store indoors, whereas these barrels were in fact stored in the open air, the clause would not, I think, apply. Indeed, at one time that was, I think, going to be the appellant's case, but it was abandoned. Mr. Sofer, however, goes on to contend that, even so, the onus is on the respondents to show that the exemption clause has not been, as it were, displaced by any such breach of a fundamental term, and in this regard he relies strongly on the decision of McNair J. in Woolmer v. Delmer Price Ltd.[16] In that case a fur coat had been stored with the defendants under a contract which provided that "all "goods are left at customers' risk"—a clause which it was held exempted the bailees from liability for negligence. They were, however, unable to show how the loss occurred, and McNair J.

said [17]: "But if, as is the case here, they have failed to adduce "satisfactory evidence of how the loss occurred, and the loss "may have occurred in a way which would not be covered by "the protective clause, then the protective clause does not avail "them." McNair J. went on to point to two sets of facts which might have occurred in that case, both amounting to breaches of fundamental terms, in which case the exempting clause would not apply. For my part, I think it is necessary to see the nature of the present proceedings and the way the pleadings are framed. I would observe that it is not a case of a mere failure to redeliver. The goods were redelivered, and redelivered damaged. In those circumstances, as it seems to me perfectly properly, the counterclaim alleged a breach of an implied contractual term to exercise reasonable care and alternatively negligence. It was said that by reason of that breach or that negligence the loss had occurred. I think in the course of the argument, when I raised this matter, Mr. Sofer took it as a criticism of his pleading. I would like to make it quite clear that I did not intend to criticize the pleading. It is a perfectly good pleading, and it pleaded the complaint made, and the only complaint that could be made. In those circumstances, it seems to me that the county court judge, having found that the negligence alleged was proved, was perfectly right in saying that the exemption clause applied. I am far from saying that the onus is not on defendants in a case where they have failed completely to redeliver or where the plaintiff has alleged a breach of a fundamental term. Thinking, as I do, that it is quite a different case from that which was before McNair J., I find it unnecessary to go into the submissions of Mr. Megaw, on behalf of the respondents, that that case—Woolmer v. Delmer Price Ltd.[18]—was wrongly decided.

I would only add this, that while sympathizing with the course which the county court judge took, I think it is a pity that the case was not heard out; but it is only right to say that, in my view, the only parties aggrieved thereby are the respondents, against whom there is a finding of negligence, albeit they are exempted from liability therefor, when they had never had an opportunity of proving that they were not negligent. I would dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

Denning, Morris and Romer L.JJ.

Damages—Negligence—Surveyor—Property purchased in reliance on negligent report by surveyor—Measure of damages—"Value"—Cost of repair not recoverable—Damages measurable by difference in value of property as described and as it ought to have been described—Date of assessment—Quantum of damages not to be altered by fall in value of money between date when cause of action accrued and date of hearing of action.

In June, 1952, the plaintiff, in reliance on a negligent and inaccurate report by the defendant surveyor, purchased for £25,000 a property the market value of which in its actual condition was found by the official referee to be £21,000; but after moving in, the plaintiff found that it would require an additional expenditure of £7,000 at 1952 prices to put the property into the condition in which it had been described in the report. In an action for damages for negligence against the surveyor, the plaintiff claimed, inter alia, the cost of repair at prices ruling at the date of the hearing. But the official referee awarded him £4,000, namely, the difference between the value of the property as it should have been described and its value as described (viz., £25,000). On appeal by the plaintiff:—

Held, (1) that the proper measure of damages in this case was the difference in money between the value of the property in the condition described and its value as it should have been described, namely, £4,000; the proper measure of damages was not the cost of repair, which included other factors, such as tax relief and savings on the annual cost of upkeep resulting from the replacement of new for old.

Measure of damages in cases where damage was caused by a tortfeasor or by tenant's breach of repairs covenant, and in Baxter v. Gapp & Co. Ltd. [1939] 2 K.B. 271; 55 T.L.R. 739; [1939] 2 All E.R. 752 distinguished.

Morris v. Sands (unreported, July 15, 1955) considered.

(2) That the damages must be assessed at the prices prevailing when the damage occurred—1952—and that figure could not in law be affected by a fall thereafter in the value of money.

Decision of official referee affirmed.

APPEAL from official referee (His Honour W. K. Carter Q.C.).

In 1952 the plaintiff, Richard Montague Philips, instructed the defendant, L. E. Ward, a surveyor, to survey and advise him on the structural and general condition of an Elizabethan manor house farm consisting of house, two cottages, oasthouses, and 137 acres of land. The surveyor inspected the property, and on February 4, 1952, made a written report stating that the house was of very substantial construction, with the best materials and workmanship lavished on it, but that there were minor defects, which he set out. He estimated the value of the property as somewhere between £25,000 and £27,000. In reliance on that report, the plaintiff, in June, 1952, bought the property for £25,000, and moved into it with his family. It was then found that the timbers of the house were badly affected by death-watch beetle and by worm, and were so rotten that the only course was to replace the roof by a new one, to rebuild the timbers in the cellars, put in new wall plates, and so forth. If the necessary work of restoration had been done at the cost levels ruling in 1952, the cost of such work would have been £7,000. The work was not done at that time but stood over pending the result of the present proceedings, in which the plaintiff claimed damages from the surveyor for negligence.

C. A. 1956

By his statement of claim the plaintiff claimed, first, approximately £16,000, on the basis that £25,000 was the value of the property without the unreported defects, whereas by reason of such defects, the property was worth no more than about £9,000; secondly and alternatively, he claimed an amount between £11,500 and £14,000, that being the expense which he alleged he would incur to put the property into tenantable repair.

The official referee, after himself inspecting the unrepaired property and hearing general evidence on valuations, found that the market value of the property in the actual condition in which it was at the date at which the plaintiff purchased it was £21,000; and that the surveyor had been negligent; but he gave judgment for the plaintiff for £4,000 only, directing himself "that the "proper measure of damages in this case is the difference "between the value of the house and farm in the condition "described in the report and their value as they should have "been described," namely, the difference between £25,000 and £21,000.

The plaintiff appealed.

Volturno[17]; Baxter v. Gapp & Co. Ltd.[18]; Whiteman v. Hawkins.[19]

DENNING L.J. stated the facts, and continued: I take it to be clear law that the proper measure of damage is the amount of money which will put Mr. Philips into as good a position as if the surveying contract had been properly fulfilled: see British Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Co. Ltd. v. Underground Electric Railways Co.,[1] per Lord Haldane L.C. Now if Mr. Ward had carried out his contract, he would have reported the bad state of the timbers. On receiving that report, Mr. Philips would either have refused to have anything to do with the house—in which case he would have suffered no damage—or he would have bought it for a sum which represented its fair value in its bad condition—in which case he would pay so much less on that account. The proper measure of damages is therefore the difference between the value in its assumed good condition and the value in the bad condition which should have been reported to the client.

We were referred to the cases where a house is damaged or destroyed by the fault of a tortfeasor. These cases are, I think, different. If the injured person reasonably goes to the expense of repairing the house, the tortfeasor may well be bound to pay the cost of repair, less an allowance because new work takes the place of old: see Lukin v. Godsall[2] and Hide v. Thornborough.[3] In other cases, the tortfeasor may only have to pay the value of the house: see Moss v. Christchurch Rural District Council.[4] It all depends on the circumstances of the case: see Murphy v. The County Council of Wexford.[5] The general rule is that the injured person is to be fairly compensated for the damage he has sustained, neither more nor less.

We were also referred to the cases where a house is left out of repair by a tenant in breach of his covenant. These cases, too, are different, because a surveyor does not enter into a covenant to repair and he gives no warranty as to the condition of the premises. If those cases were relevant, however, they go to show that the cost of repair is not nowadays the proper measure. We had a case not long ago where a purchaser bought a Georgian house and 25 acres for £6,250 and then sought to recover from the tenant £7,333 for dilapidations, because that was the cost of repair. That would mean that he got the place for nothing and £1,083 in pocket as well. The official referee awarded £7,333, but this court reversed him. I there said that the cost of repair "is not the proper test in the case of a con-" siderable estate. In such a case the purchase price is often

Philips v. Ward.
Denning L.J.

"not much affected by the want of repair, because a purchaser "can turn it to his advantage in that, when he puts it into "repair, he can get considerable tax relief. Further, when "extensive land is included in the sale in addition to the house, "the want of repair of the house does not influence the price so "greatly as it otherwise would. So many factors come into play "that the cost of repairs is not the test. The proper criterion "is to take the difference in value between the premises as they "ought to have been, delivered up in repair, and the value of "the premises as they are, delivered up out of repair. The "difference is the measure of damages to which the landlord is "entitled": see Morris v. Sands.[6] So also in this action, if Mr. Philips were to recover from the surveyor the sum of £7,000, it would mean that Mr. Philips would get for £18,000 (£25,000 paid less £7,000 received) a house and land which were worth £21,000. That cannot be right. The proper amount for him to recover is £4,000.

Another point arose about the time at which the damages should be assessed. The cost of repair has risen considerably since the house was bought, and it will cost Mr. Philips a good deal more than £7,000 now to put his house right. The £7,000 is based on 1952 costs, not 1956 costs. The £4,000 is derived from that figure, and represents the difference in value at 1952 prices, not those ruling today. I think that it is right to assess the damages as at 1952 prices. The general principle of English law is that damages must be assessed as at the date when the damage occurs, which is usually the same day as the cause of action arises, but may be later: see Cummings v. London Bullion Co. Ltd.[7] A fall thereafter in the value of money does not in law affect the figure, for the simple reason that sterling is taken to be constant in value: see Di Ferdinando v. Simon Smits & Co.,[8] per Scrutton L.J.[9]; S.S. Celia v. S.S. Volturno,[10] per Lord Wrenbury[11]; Bishop v. Cunard White Star Co., The Queen Mary,[12] per Hodson J.[13] In the case of continuing damage (as in personal injury cases) the award for permanent disability can and usually does take into account the fall in the value of money since the accident; but that is because much of the damage has accrued and will accrue since that date. In my opinion the official referee was quite right, and I would dismiss the appeal.

Morris L.J. stated the facts, and continued: The plaintiff purchased the property in June, 1952. In doing so, he placed reliance on the report of the defendant which left him in ignorance of the serious defects which in fact existed and which the defendant ought to have discovered and mentioned. The defects came to the knowledge of the plaintiff later in 1952. If the necessary work of restoration had been undertaken at the cost levels ruling in 1952, the cost of such work would have been £7,000. In fact, the work of restoration has not yet been undertaken and cost levels are now higher. If damages are to be awarded by reference to the cost of executing the work, it was submitted that such cost should be computed by taking the cost levels ruling at the time of the hearing of the action. It was said that it was reasonable to postpone the execution of the work so that the state of the property should be available for inspection at the date of the hearing; it was said that the official referee availed himself of the opportunity of inspecting the property and that this demonstrated that it was reasonable to have deferred the work of repair. I cannot accede to this view. If the measure of damages is to be fixed by reference to the cost of executing repairs, it should be the 1952 cost. There could have been inspections before putting work in hand, and witnesses could have testified as to what they had seen. If necessary, photographs could also have been taken.

The official referee has held that the plaintiff should recover £4,000 as being the difference between the value of the property in the condition described in the report and the value of it as it should have been described. The plaintiff, who appeals, submits that the award should have been on the basis of what at the date of the hearing in November, 1955, or alternatively what in 1952 it would have cost to do the work of restoration.

In his judgment the official referee said: "I direct myself "that the proper measure of damages in this case is the difference "between the value of the house and farm in the condition "described in the report and their value as they should have "been described." It was submitted on behalf of the respondent that no point of law arises, and that the decision was one of fact as to the amount of the damages to be awarded to compensate the plaintiff. I think, however, that it is open to the appellant to submit, if he can, that there was a wrong approach in law, or that the basis of the finding was wrong in law and to succeed if this is shown. In his statement of claim, the plaintiff claimed his damages in alternative ways. First, he claimed £16,000, approximately, on the basis that £25,000 was the value of the property without the unreported defects, whereas "by reason of "such defects the said property was worth no more than about "£9,000." Secondly, the plaintiff claimed an amount of between approximately £11,500 and £14,000 as being the expense which he would incur in order to put the property in tenantable repair.

In my judgment, the damages to be assessed were such as could fairly and reasonably be considered as resulting naturally from the failure of the defendant to report as he should have done. I do not find any error of approach on the part of the official referee. It is said, however, that he was not warranted in proceeding on the basis which in fact constituted the first of the two alternative bases put forward in the statement of claim by the plaintiff, namely, the basis of the difference between the value of the property as it was described in the defendant's report and its value as it should have been described. In my view, however, that was the correct basis on the facts of this case.

If the plaintiff had discovered the omissions or errors in the defendant's report before he had contracted to buy, it may be that he would not have proceeded with his projected purchase. If he had wished to proceed and had received an estimate of £7,000 as being the cost of doing work of restoration, it may be that he would have offered £18,000 and would have urged that that was an appropriate figure to pay, having regard to the fact that he would have to spend £7,000. But the finding in this case shows that the property was, at the time of the sale, actually worth £21,000. Accordingly, the owner would not have been likely to sell for £18,000 property which was worth £21,000. It might at first seem surprising that the reduction in value below £25,000 should be less than the cost of executing the necessary work. But, apart from the fact that this was the finding of fact based on the general evidence given at the hearing in regard to valuations, it is to be remembered that property in which there is extensive new work by way of repair or restoration may have an increased life and may acquire an enhanced value. In the present case, if the repair work costing £7,000 had been done in 1952, it seems very likely that the roof would then have been put into a condition so that it would last longer than it would have lasted had it been an old roof, though an old roof not impaired by the ravages of the death-watch beetle. Similar considerations might apply in regard to the replacement of the main timbers of the house. Furthermore, the effecting of the repair work costing £7,000 would most probably have had the result that the annual cost of upkeep of the property would be diminished. But the plaintiff must not be placed in a better position by the award of damages than he would have been in had the defendant given a proper report. If the plaintiff had received £7,000 damages in 1952 on the basis of what it would then cost him to do the repair work, and instead of doing the work had sold the property for £21,000, which was its value, he would have profited to the extent of £3,000. The present case differs from Baxter v. Gapp & Co.,[14] where a negligently given valuation caused the plaintiff to advance money on mortgage to an unsatisfactory borrower, with the result that the plaintiff as mortgagee was put to expense and loss. The amount of such expense and loss was in that case the measure of the damage sustained by the plaintiff. In the present case, the plaintiff, being mindful to purchase a property and seeking advice as to its condition, paid £25,000 for it, which would have been its value if it had been in the condition described by the defendant, whereas its real value in its actual condition as it should have been described by the defendant was £21,000. In those circumstances, it seems to me that the figure of £4,000 represented the proper measure of the damage sustained by the plaintiff, and I see no error of law in the approach of the official referee.

ROMER L.J. It appears to me that in order to arrive at a correct solution of the problem in this case one has to compare the position into which the plaintiff was put by the defendant's failure to perform his duty with the position in which he would have been had the defendant performed it; and in so far as the first position is more unfavourable to the plaintiff than the second, and the difference can be assessed in terms of money, then prima facie that assessment is the measure of the defendant's liability to the plaintiff.

By reason of the defendant's inaccurate report, the plaintiff bought for £25,000 what he believed to be a property which was in good condition, only to discover after he had bought it and moved in that it would require an additional expenditure of some £7,000 to put the property into the state which the defendant had advised him that it was in already. The plaintiff accordingly contends that he is entitled to recover more than £7,000, if the cost of the necessary work to the property be taken at the date of the hearing before the official referee, which he submits it should be, instead of 1952. At first sight, there would seem to be much to be said in favour of the view that the extra expense with which the plaintiff was unexpectedly confronted is the proper measure of the damages recoverable from the defendant—subject, possibly, to some deduction for the fact that, as a result of the work being done, the plaintiff would have new material in the house instead of old. It is, however, as I have already suggested, necessary to consider not only what did in fact happen, but also what the plaintiff's position would have been if the defendant had performed his contract by sending in an accurate report as to the condition of the property; and this position has to be considered in the light of the official referee's finding that the market price of the property, after taking into account the defects which the defendant failed to disclose, was £21,000. If the plaintiff had received a report which revealed these defects, he would have known that he would have to spend £7,000 in addition to finding the purchase money for the house. With this knowledge, he might have decided that he would not buy the property at all, in which case he would have kept his money in his pocket and had no house. (On this hypothesis his ignorance of the defects may be said to have worsened his position to the extent of £4,000, for he parted with £25,000 and became the possessor of property worth only £21,000.) As an alternative to deciding not to buy the house, with knowledge of its defects, he might have made up his mind to purchase it at the reduced value of £21,000 and

PHILIPS v. WARD.

carry out the work which had to be done, at the cost of £7,000. In that event, he would have had to spend £28,000 instead of the £32,000 total expenditure which resulted from his buying the property on the faith of the defendant's report. On this hypothesis also, then, his position was worsened to the extent of £4,000, namely, the difference between £28,000 and £32,000. On such facts as are before us, I can think of no action that the plaintiff might have taken, had he received a true report from the defendant, other than not buying the property at all, on the one hand, or buying it at its market price, on the other; and as he would have been £4,000 better off by taking either action than he became by acting on the defendant's report, it seems to me that that is the true sum which he is entitled to recover from the defendant. It may well be that if, on learning of the real condition of the house, he had decided to leave and resell, he would have been entitled to recover from the defendant, in addition to the £4,000, his costs and expenses of moving in and moving out and of the resale. As, however, he elected to stay, after all the facts had become known to him, this point does not arise.

I feel, accordingly, constrained to reject the plaintiff's claim to £7,000; and I would only add that even if I had been able to accept the principle on which it was based, I can see no warrant for the plaintiff's submission that the sum should be increased so as to reflect the diminution in the value of the pound since 1952. I would dismiss the appeal.

by both of the defendants, Michael Feinstein and his wife, Marie Feinstein. Both defendants denied by their defence that either of them had spoken or published the words alleged. On January 4, 1956, Master Clayton granted the first-named plaintiff an order to be examined before an examiner of the court or a master or examiner to be agreed on, on medical grounds. The defendants appealed against this order to Slade J. in chambers, who has approved the publication of the following note of the reasons for his decision supplied by counsel.

Gabriel Cohen for the plaintiffs.
Lord Dunboyne (F. H. Lawton with him) for the defendants.

SLADE J. said that he was fully alive to the practice of requiring strong evidence in support of an application by a party to an action to have his evidence taken otherwise than before the court. Further, he was fully alive to the even greater importance of following that practice when the action was to be before a jury more especially so when the party applying was the plaintiff and not the defendant, because it was the plaintiff who had chosen the venue, and, when the action was one for defamation, it was of paramount importance that the jury should see the plaintiff. Although granting or refusing leave was a question of discretion, the discretion should be exercised on the principle of refusing to allow the plaintiff's evidence to be given elsewhere than before the court, unless " ' there are very strong positive reasons ' for " his not attending to be examined at the trial " (see Gatley on Libel and Slander, 4th ed., p. 545, citing Cotton L.J. in Lawson v. Vacuum Brake Co.[1]).

He was prepared to assume that, where the reasons were based on the plaintiff's ill-health, an order for examination before an examiner would not be made unless it was shown that the plaintiff could only attend the court with some risk to his life. There was evidence, which was not in dispute, that the first-named plaintiff suffered serious organic heart disease, and there was also evidence, which was not common ground although quite strong evidence, that the excitement of attending the trial and undergoing cross-examination might well involve considerable risk to his life. It seemed that no serious injury could accrue to the defendants by making the order which he proposed to make, subject to the conditions as to the use of the depositions at the trial, whereas very grave injury might accrue to the first-named plaintiff if he refused to make the order de bene esse and, when the trial was reached, it was no longer in dispute between the parties that the first-named plaintiff's attendance would involve risk to his life. Therefore, he exercised his discretion and varied the master's order by providing that the deposition of the first-named plaintiff to be taken thereunder should not be used at the trial of the action

* In re A DEBTOR (No. 66 of 1955). Ex parte THE DEBTOR v. THE TRUSTEE OF THE PROPERTY OF WAITE (A Bankrupt).

Bankruptcy — Set off — Mutual dealings — Sale of goods on credit by debtor to purchaser—Guarantee by purchaser of debtor's overdraft secured by deposit of title deeds—Debt due to debtor from purchaser — Receiving order made against purchaser — Discharge by purchaser's trustee of overdraft to obtain release of title deeds — Judgment for trustee against debtor to recover amount paid to bank —Receiving order against debtor on petition of trustee—Claim for set off by debtor—Whether mutual dealings—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (4 & 5 Geo. 5, c. 59), s. 31.

In January, 1952, the debtor agreed to sell to W. on credit goods for which the debtor had to pay in cash. In order to pay for the goods the debtor found it necessary to borrow money from his bank, and W. in consideration of the credit which he thus received agreed to guarantee the debtor's overdraft to an extent not exceeding £200, the guarantee being secured by a deposit of title deeds of certain property owned by W. During 1952 the debtor supplied goods to W. to the value of £201 14s. 6d. and W. paid £100 into the debtor's bank, which left a balance due of £101 14s. 6d. On October 1, 1954, a receiving order was made against W. and W.'s trustee in bankruptcy, in the course of realizing the assets and in order to complete a sale by him of the property secured by the deposit of title deeds, paid to the debtor's bank the sum of £133 14s., the amount (with interest) of the debtor's overdraft, and obtained the release of the deeds.

On September 9, 1955, W.'s trustee commenced an action in the Brighton District Registry against the debtor to recover the sum of £133 14s. "paid for the defendant as his surety." The debtor appeared and claimed to set off the sum of £101 14s. 6d. for the goods supplied to W. and interest on the overdraft, but on October 6, 1955, the district registrar gave leave to W.'s trustee to sign judgment for the sum of £133 14s. and £16 16s. costs, a total of £150 10s. On October 15, 1955, W.'s trustee in bankruptcy obtained the issue of a bankruptcy notice to the debtor in which was claimed payment of the sum of £150 10s. This bankruptcy notice was not complied with and on December 22, 1955, W.'s trustee filed a petition in bankruptcy against the debtor based on the judgment debt.

On February 2, 1956, the registrar (who was the same person as the registrar of the Brighton District Registry) was asked on behalf of the debtor to go behind his decision as district registrar in his judgment of October 6, 1955, and allow the set off claimed by the debtor. On February 6, 1956, the registrar, in a judgment, refused to go behind his previous judgment. On February 9, 1956, a receiving order was made against the debtor. The debtor appealed:—

Held, that, as at the date of W.'s bankruptcy there was nothing presently due from the debtor to W. (the liability of the debtor not to W. but to the trustee having accrued later when the bank was paid off) there was no debt against which W.'s debt could be set off under section 31; so that the judgment against the debtor was good and a proper foundation for a bankruptcy notice.

Per curiam. The registrar was in error in refusing to go behind his previous judgment on the ground that the debtor had not availed himself of his right to appeal against it, for even if the debtor had appealed and had lost the appeal, it would still have been open to the Bankruptcy Court to go behind the judgment and reopen the matter.

Appeal from Brighton County Court.

The debtor appealed against a receiving order made against him by the registrar of Brighton County Court on February 9, 1956. The principal ground of the appeal was the refusal of the registrar to give effect to a set off claimed to be effective under the provisions of section 31 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914.[1] The petitioning creditor in this case was the trustee of the property of one Ernest Edward Waite, a bankrupt, and it was in the bankruptcy of Ernest Edward Waite that the set off was alleged to be operative.

The facts are fully set out in the judgment of the court.

A Debtor (No. 66 of 1955), In re.

March 26, 1956. Harman J. I will ask Danckwerts J. to read the judgment of the court.

Danckwerts J. This is an appeal against a receiving order made by the registrar of the Brighton County Court on February 9, 1956, against the appellant. The principal ground of the appeal is the refusal of the registrar to give effect to a set off claimed to be effective under the provisions of section 31 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. The petitioning creditor in this case is the trustee of the property of Ernest Edward Waite, a bankrupt, and it is in his bankruptcy that the set off is alleged to be operative.

The receiving order in Waite's bankruptcy was made in the Brighton county court on October 1, 1954. It appears that at that date the position was as follows. In January, 1952, the appellant had agreed to supply Waite with goods which had to be paid for by the appellant with cash, but were to be sold to Waite in the normal course of business (whatever that may mean)—presumably on trade terms with some months' credit. Accordingly the appellant had to borrow money from his bank. In consideration of the credit which he thus received Waite agreed to guarantee the appellant's overdraft to an extent not exceeding £200. He gave this guarantee on January 14, 1952, and apparently backed it by the deposit of title deeds of property of his. During 1952 the appellant supplied goods to Waite of the value of £201 14s. 6d., and Waite paid £100 into the appellant's bank, leaving a balance due to the appellant from Waite of £101 14s. 6d. That was the position on October 1, 1954, or must for present purposes be taken to be the position. The amount of Waite's indebtedness has not been proved or agreed, but the appellant has a right of proof in that bankruptcy.

Waite's trustee, in the course of realizing his assets and in order to complete a sale by him of the property, mentioned above, had to obtain a release of the title deeds, and, accordingly, on July 20, 1955, he paid the sum of £133 14s. 0d., the amount of the appellant's overdraft, to his bank and secured the release of the deeds. On September 9, 1955, Waite's trustee started an action in the Brighton District Registry of the High Court of Justice against the appellant to recover the sum of £133 14s. 0d. "paid for the defendant as his surety." The appellant appeared and put in an affidavit when the plaintiff applied for judgment under R.S.C., Ord. 14, claiming to set off the sum of £101 14s. 6d. for the goods supplied to Waite, but on October 6, 1955, the district registrar (who was the same person as the registrar of the Brighton County Court) gave leave to Waite's trustee to sign judgment for the sum of £133 14s. 0d. and £16 16s. 0d. costs, a total of £150 10s. 0d.

On October 15, 1955, Waite's trustee in bankruptcy obtained the issue of a bankruptcy notice to the appellant claiming payment of the sum of £150 10s. 0d. "to him" and referring to "a contra claim set off or cross demand against him." It is contended on behalf of the appellant that this notice is defective because the words " as such trustee," or something of that kind, showing that it is not a personal claim by the individual who is Waite's trustee, are lacking. We can dispose of this point at once by saying that in our view this objection is without foundation. It is quite plain that the notice is by Waite's trustee as such (his personal name does not appear) and the case in no way resembles In re a Debtor (No. 41 of 1951).[1]

This bankruptcy notice was not complied with, and on December 22, 1955, Waite's trustee filed a petition in bankruptcy against the appellant based on the judgment debt of £150 10s. 0d. due " to me." The petition was plainly presented by the trustee of the property of Ernest Edward Waite, but an objection was taken to the form of the petition, similar to that taken in respect of the bankruptcy notice. Both these objections were rejected by the registrar on January 20, 1956, and, in our view, his decision was plainly right.

On February 2, 1956, at a further hearing, the registrar was asked on behalf of the appellant to go behind his decision as district registrar in his judgment of October 6, 1955, and allow the set off claimed by the appellant. The point was that if the set off was allowed the debt on which the petitioning creditor relied would be reduced below the sum of £50 required to support the petition. On February 6, 1956, the registrar gave judgment declining to go behind his previous judgment on the ground that the proper way to test his previous judgment was an appeal of which the debtor had not availed himself. In this respect it seems that the registrar was undoubtedly wrong, as even if the debtor had appealed, and even if he had lost in the Court of Appeal, it would still have been open to the Bankruptcy Court to go behind the judgment and reopen the matter. This is clear from In re Fraser.[2]

At a further hearing before the registrar on February 9, 1956, the receiving order now appealed against was made.

The first point for us is that which the registrar decided in the action and refused to reopen, namely, whether the appellant was entitled to rely on the provisions as to set off, contained in section 31 of the Act, in Waite's bankruptcy as against Waite's trustee. Section 31 provides as follows: [His Lordship read the relevant part of the section, and continued:] The material date for the purpose of the set off under this section is the date of the receiving order in Waite's bankruptcy; that is, October 1, 1954. At that date the appellant had a right to prove for the debt due to him from Waite, £101 14s. 6d. At that date, beyond the £100 which Waite had paid in respect of the goods purchased from the appellant, no payments had been made by Waite; he was a debtor for the balance due on the goods and he was a surety for the appellant's overdraft at the bank by reason of the guarantee which he had given. It is much later that Waite's trustee, in order to complete the sale of an asset of Waite's estate, was compelled to pay the appellant's bank £133 14s. 0d.

Thus, while it is true that there had been mutual dealings between the appellant and Waite, there were at the date of Waite's receiving order no mutual debts to be set off. It appears to us to be a very odd result if the expenditure by the trustee of £133 14s. 0d. of Waite's creditors' money, in order to complete the sale of an asset, enables the appellant to secure payment in full of the debt for which up to that time he had only a right of proof, while at the same time he has been freed from his overdraft at the bank. But this, it is said, is the result of the authorities.

Mr. Muir Hunter, for the appellant, relied on the case of In re Daintrey.[3] In that case Daintrey, a solicitor, was indebted to Mant for £86. He then sold his practice to Mant under an agreement whereby Mant was to pay him a portion of the profits at the end of three years. A receiving order was made against Daintrey, at a date when no profits had been earned. At the end of the three years a sum of £300 was found to be payable by Mant to Daintrey. It was held by the Court of Appeal that, though the date of the receiving order was the relevant date for the purposes of the section, the £86 and the £300 ought to be set off, because the amount of £300 was payable under an agreement which existed at the date of the receiving order, though the amount due was not ascertainable till later. This seems to us to be a different case from the present: there was an existing obligation by Mant to Daintrey at the date of the receiving order; it was merely the amount due which came to be quantified when the accounts were subsequently taken.

Peat v. Jones & Co.[4] seems to us to present no difficulty. It is true that unliquidated damages for non-delivery of goods under a contract were set off against a claim for the price of the goods which had been delivered. But both claims arose out of the same contract, and it was merely a matter of quantification; and it seems, therefore, to be an obvious case for the application of a set off.

Ex parte Barrett[5] at first sight seems to give some support to the claim of a set off. The facts, however, are very unusual. Corbett mortgaged coal mines to Lee, with Barrett as surety. Corbett then sold the equity of redemption to a company which covenanted to indemnify Corbett against the mortgage. In order to satisfy Lee, the company gave him their promissory note for £7,000. The company subsequently went into liquidation. Barrett's sister took an assignment from Lee of the mortgage debt and all securities for it, including the company's note for £7,000. It appears that Barrett was liable as a shareholder and contributory of the company, and he took an assignment of the mortgage and the company's note for £7,000 from his sister and gave her his own promissory note for £7,000. He then claimed to set off the liability of the company on the company's note for £7,000 against the claim by the liquidator for calls on his shares, and it was held by the Lord Chancellor that the set off applied. The basis of the decision was that Barrett as surety had before the liquidation a right to have the security transferred to him; his rights, therefore, accrued before the liquidation and as one of the securities happened to be the company's promissory note he was held entitled to use it as a set off.

It is to be observed that in the present case it was the surety who was insolvent (Waite), and it was not he who paid off the debt, but his trustee in bankruptcy after the date when the property of the surety had vested in the trustee. These circumstances seem to us to distinguish the present case from Ex parte Barrett.[6]

There are, on the other hand, authorities which seem to show that the set off section is not applicable in circumstances like the present case.

Kitchen's Trustee v. Madders[7] was rather a complicated case. A trustee in bankruptcy was claiming arrears of rent for five quarters, three of which accrued after the date of the receiving order, and it was sought to set off against this claim a large sum of damages (for which judgment had been obtained) for fraudulent misrepresentation. In the Court of Appeal a further claim to set off rent improperly overpaid by reason of the Rent Acts was allowed to be put in. Some observations of Cohen L.J.[8] have been misunderstood, as pointed out by Jenkins L.J. in Bradley-Hole v. Cusen,[9] in so far as they have been applied to the claim for rents overpaid. The set off of these was properly allowable against the trustee's claim for arrears of rent, as they arose out of the same transaction. But the real basis of the decision that, subject to this, no set off was allowable against the trustee's claim in respect of the rent for the three quarters which accrued after the date of the receiving order, appears from the judgment of Harman J. in the court below.[10] Harman J. was only dealing with the claim to set off the judgment for damages for fraudulent misrepresentation (as the other claim had not then been put forward). He points out that the three quarters' rents had never been due to the bankrupt but had become due to the trustee in bankruptcy after the date of the receiving order, and so there was no such mutuality as would permit of a set off of the judgment for damages against them. See also Alloway v. Steere.[11]

The claim in the present case for a set off also seems to be contrary to the statement of the law made by the Court of Appeal in In re Fenton.[12] Fenton had guaranteed advances by certain banks to the Fenton Textile Association. The Association went into liquidation and the liquidator lodged a proof against Fenton's estate in bankruptcy in respect of sums due by Fenton to the Association. Fenton's trustee rejected the proof and claimed to set off the various sums which had been advanced by the banks to the Association for which Fenton had given his personal guarantee. The banks had proved against Fenton's estate under the guarantee but had received nothing. It was held that inasmuch as none of these sums had in fact been paid by Fenton or his trustee to the banks, the trustee was not entitled, under section 31 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, to set off Fenton's contingent liability under the guarantees against the sums due by him to the Association. In the present case Waite's trustee in bankruptcy has now paid off the guarantee. But the resemblance to In re Fenton is in respect of the situation at the date of the receiving order. Lawrence L.J.[13] makes some observations on the position of a surety who has not paid anything: "The law as to "the right of a surety to indemnity where the principal debtor is "solvent is not in doubt. Until the surety is called upon to pay "and does pay something under his guarantee, there is no debt or "right at law at all; until then a surety's right is confined to a "right to come into equity in order to get an indemnity against "his liability to the principal creditor: see per Parker J. in "In re Mitchell.[14] The form which the order takes in such "case (as shown by Wolmershausen v. Gullick [15]) is a declaration "of liability, followed by an order upon the principal debtor to "pay or secure the debt. Even a solvent surety is not entitled "to an order for payment to himself of the amount of the debt, "as such a payment would not discharge the principal debtor "from his liability to the principal creditor; much less is the "trustee of a bankrupt surety entitled to any such payment, "as the money paid to him by the principal debtor would be "distributable amongst the general creditors of the surety leaving "the principal debtor liable to pay the debt due to the principal "creditor."

If, as Lawrence L.J. says, until the surety is called upon to pay and does pay something under his guarantee, there is no debt or right at law at all, then at the date of the receiving order in Waite's bankruptcy (when payment in respect of the guarantee had not been made) there was no debt due to Waite which could be the subject of any set off in respect of the moneys owed by Waite to the appellant for goods supplied. A debt due from the appellant did not arise until subsequently Waite's trustee made a payment to the bank.

Romer L.J.[16] puts a supposition which seems very pertinent to the present case: "Let me now consider the case upon the

[14] [1913] 1 Ch. 201, 206.

"supposition that Fenton became bankrupt, but the Association "remained solvent. The Association would then have had to "prove for the £436,000 in the bankruptcy. But could Fenton's "trustee have set off his liability to the banks against such proof? "In my opinion he could not. That there were mutual dealings "between the Association and Fenton resulting in the debt due "to the Association on the one hand and the liability of the "Association to indemnify Fenton against his liability to the "banks on the other may be conceded. But there was nothing "'due' from the Association to Fenton which could have been "placed to Fenton's credit in the account that would have been "taken under section 31 of the Bankruptcy Act. A set off would "have been equivalent to a payment by the Association to "Fenton's trustee for the general benefit of his creditors, leaving "the Association still liable to the banks. The trustee's right "against the Association could have been no greater than "Fenton's before his bankruptcy. He could have only obtained "an order upon the Association to discharge their indebtedness "to the banks. That would have been the only way in which "he could have compelled the Association to discharge their "contingent liability to Fenton's estate."

Now, if in this passage there is substituted for Fenton, Waite (the surety becoming bankrupt) and, for the Association, the appellant (the solvent principal debtor), the remarks of Romer L.J. exactly cover the present case. There was nothing due from the appellant to Waite at the date of the receiving order. It was only later, when the trustee in bankruptcy paid off the bank, that a debt became due from the appellant, and that payment was made not by Waite but by the trustee, and out of assets which then were no longer vested in Waite but in the trustee. It seems to us, therefore, that the decision in the action by Waite's trustee against the appellant was right in declining to admit the set off. There was in fact no mutuality at the date of the receiving order in Waite's bankruptcy and the debt on which the action was founded was not due to Waite but to his trustee. It follows that the judgment was good and was a proper foundation for a bankruptcy notice which, therefore, could not have been set aside. See In re a Bankruptcy Notice (No. 171 of 1934).[17] The notice not having been complied with, the petition is, on the face of it, in order. That, however, is not an end of the matter. The Court of Bankruptcy is not bound to make a receiving order. Section 5 (2) provides that the court "may "make a receiving order in pursuance of the petition." Under subsection (3): "If the court . . . is satisfied . . . that for other "sufficient cause no order ought to be made, the court may "dismiss the petition." It was argued that the petition ought to have been dismissed here owing to the following circumstance.

A Debtor (No. 66 of 1955), In re.

It was said that in the appellant's bankruptcy Waite's trustee would have to prove for his debt, but that in that bankruptcy he could be met by the appellant's claim against him for the £101 due from Waite and that if this were right the debt of the petitioning creditor would be reduced below £50 which would show that he ought never to have been allowed to proceed on his petition. There is certainly force in this submission, but we do not consider that we ought to refuse the order because of it. In the first place, the existence of the alleged debt of £101 has never yet been proved. The petitioner is a judgment creditor for £150 and, therefore, prima facie entitled to have an order made on his petition. Even if the set off be allowed in the appellant's bankruptcy, as to which we decide nothing today, there will remain a debt. The result may well be in the end that each party will be entitled to prove in the other's bankruptcy, a result we think more consonant with justice to the other creditors of each of them than any set off. We therefore dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

BYRNE J. This is a motion on behalf of the defendant, in whose favour a nominal order for costs was made against the plaintiff as an assisted person at Exeter Assizes on November 10, 1954, to vary the plaintiff's liability for costs under regulation 17 (4) of the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, as amended. The motion is in accordance with the following procedure approved by Lord Goddard C.J. on March 14, 1956: "Where a "party in whose favour an order for costs has been made against "an assisted person after trial by a judge of the Queen's Bench "Division in London or on circuit desires to apply 'to the court' "under regulation 17 (4) of the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, "1950, as amended, for variation of the order, the application "should be made by notice of motion (R.S.C., Ord. 52) before "the judge who made the order, if convenient, or to the judge "in charge of the appropriate list. The notice of motion, entitled "in the action, may be framed from Form No. 1 on p. 967 of "Chitty's Queen's Bench Forms, 18th ed. The applicant's solici-"tor should, though the Crown Office and Associates' Department "in London, consult the judge's clerk and ascertain a convenient "date and time for the hearing. The notice of motion should be "served personally on the assisted person with at least two clear "days between the service of the notice of motion and the date "of hearing in accordance with R.S.C., Ord. 52, r. 5. The "hearing will be before the judge in open court, when the pro-"visions of regulation 17, in determining the amount of the "assisted person's liability for costs in accordance with section 2 "(2) (e) of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, will apply. Any "order made for an increase of the amount of liability shall "include a direction that the judgment shall be indorsed "accordingly."

I am satisfied in the present case that there has been a change in circumstances. It was agreed between the parties at the time of the action that the plaintiff's weekly wage was £4 14s. 6d., and it now transpires from an affidavit by her present employer that she is receiving at least £6 a week, because her salary is £5 19s. and there is also commission. I think, therefore, that this is a case in which the order should be varied. When I originally made an order, it was merely to keep the matter alive, she at that time being an assisted person, but an infant, she now being of full age and a married woman. I recognize the fact, as she states in her affidavit, that she is expecting a child in October, 1956, and I think that that is a matter that I should take into consideration in deciding what my order should be. The order that I propose to make, having regard to all that I have heard, is that there will be an order that the plaintiff pays £75 costs by instalments of £8 a month, the first instalment to be payable on May 1, and she shall have liberty to apply to me in chambers to vary the amount of the instalments if it becomes necessary. The judgment containing the original determination shall be indorsed accordingly. I make no order as to costs with regard to this application.

Agriculture—Agricultural holding—Notice to quit—Reasons stated—Ambiguity—Validity—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948 (11 & 12 Geo. 6, c. 63), s. 24 (1) (2) (d).

The tenant of an agricultural holding was served with a notice to quit, which included, inter alia, the following reasons for the landlords' decision to terminate the tenancy, namely: (1) that rent due was in arrear; (2) that the tenant had not kept the farm property and appurtenances in good tenantable repair, and (3) that he had not complied with the terms of an agreement entered into by him, whereby he agreed to repay moneys expended by the landlords, upon repairs to the property, on his behalf. The tenant served a counter-notice, in accordance with section 24 (1) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948,[1] and the consent of the Minister

(2) The foregoing subsection shall not apply where— . . . was applied for, by the landlords, and granted. The tenant then issued a writ for a declaration that the notice to quit was invalid on the grounds that it was not a clear and unambiguous notice under section 24 (1) and that, in stating reasons, it fell within section 24 (2) yet failed to comply with paragraph (d) of that section:—

Held, that the mere stating of reasons in explanation of the notice did not bring the case within section 24 (2) of the Act of 1948; the notice was not ambiguous and the landlords were entitled to possession.

ACTION.

By an agreement in writing dated November 27, 1944, the plaintiff, Reginald Arthur Hammon, leased an agricultural holding of some 47 acres known as East Dean Farm, Headcorn, Kent, from the freeholder, Hugh Kingsley Fairbrother, at a rent of £110 a year. The agreement contained, inter alia, a covenant by the tenant to keep the farmhouse and buildings in good tenantable repair (excluding structural repairs to the farmhouse only, for which the landlord was to be liable), and provision was made for 12 months' notice to determine, to expire on September 29 in any year. In June, 1949, the freeholder died and the property vested in the defendants, as executors and trustees of his will.

On August 31, 1953, the tenant entered into an agreement with the landlords, the terms of which provided for the sale of the farm with vacant possession and the carrying out by the landlords of certain essential repairs and other works, the cost of which was to be repaid to them by the tenant. These repairs were subsequently executed and the necessary steps were taken to sell the property by auction on May 27, 1954. The tenant, however, failed to implement the agreement entered into by him and the property had to be withdrawn from auction.

On September 24, 1954, the landlords served upon the tenant notice to quit and deliver up possession of the property on September 29, 1955. The notice (which was drawn up by solicitors) set out the reasons for the landlords' decision, namely: (1) "That "rent due from September 29, 1953, is in arrear and unpaid . . . "notwithstanding written notices of the rent due having been "given to you"; (2) "That you have not kept the said farm "property and appurtenances in good tenantable repair . . ."; and (3) "That you have not complied with the terms of an agree-"ment dated August 31, 1953, entered into by you . . . and in "breach thereof have not repaid to the landlords the moneys "expended by them on your behalf on repairs to the said farm "property. . . ." The tenant served upon the landlords a counter-notice, in accordance with section 24 (1) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, which was stated to be "without "prejudice to any points arising therein." A copy of the notice to quit and the counter-notice, together with an application for consent to the operation of the notice to quit, were forwarded to the Kent County Agricultural Executive Committee by the landlords' solicitors. The committee, acting on behalf of the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries, duly heard the application, and on June 10, 1955, formal notice of consent was issued. The tenant gave notice of appeal against the Minister's decision to the Agricultural Land Tribunal but subsequently withdrew it.

On November 7, 1955, the tenant issued a writ claiming a declaration that the notice to quit was invalid. It was contended on his behalf that the notice was not a clear and unambiguous notice as it should have been if it were under section 24 (1) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, and that in giving reasons one or more of which should be characteristic of section 24 (2) (d) of the Act the notice was wholly bad. The landlords denied the invalidity of the notice and counterclaimed for possession and mesne profits.

Cassels J. stated the facts and continued: I have been referred to Cowan v. Wrayford,[1] which was a case in the Court of Appeal in which the landlord had, in fact, served a notice under section 24 (2) and then wanted to switch over to section 24 (1). The difference between the two was pointed out by Somervell L.J. when he said[2]: "There is therefore a difference "not only in procedure, but a financial difference affecting both "landlord and tenant, according as to whether the landlord is "able to establish a right to proceed under section 24 (2) (d) or "has no case for bringing himself within the words of that sub-"paragraph, but serves an ordinary notice and does in fact get "the Minister's consent if the counter-notice is served. In one "case compensation for disturbance will be payable and in another "case it will not." My attention was also called to Budge v. Hicks,[3] where Denning L.J., who was a member of the court in Cowan v. Wrayford,[4] said[5]: "If the landlord of an agricultural " holding wishes to give his tenant notice to quit, he should get " some good advice on the matter, because there are now many " legal requirements which he has to fulfil before his notice will " be good. In particular, he must state in his notice the reason " why he requires possession, and that reason must be one of " the reasons prescribed in the Act of Parliament. I do not think " that the notice need be in any particular form, but it must " at least make it clear what his reason is. In particular, when " he complains of a breach of covenant which may, or may not, " be capable of remedy, he must make it clear which it is, so that " the tenant may know whether the notice is given under sub-" paragraph (d) or (e). The notice of September 27, 1949, does " not do that. It does not make it clear under which subsection " it comes. It is therefore not a good notice." In Cowan v. Wrayford [6] Denning L.J. said [7]: " But this case cannot be con-" sidered at common law apart from the statute. The ancient " script of the common law has been over-written by the statute, " and the two have to be integrated together. In order that a " notice to quit an agricultural holding should be good, it must " be clear and unambiguous: and for that purpose it must either " be a simple notice without stating reasons at all, in which case " it will operate under section 24 (1); or it must be a notice " stating reasons as prescribed by subsection (2), in which case " it will operate under subsection (2)." I venture to think, with great respect to the Lord Justice, that the words " without stating " reasons at all " are really unnecessary for the decision of that case and I should be very sorry to have to hold that where a landlord of an agricultural holding gave notice stating reasons, which might, of course, be infinitely various and even personal, but none of which could come within paragraph (d) or any of the paragraphs of section 24 (2), the notice was therefore under section 24 (2) and subject to all the consequences of that particular section. Upon the receipt of the notice (assuming that it does not come under section 24 (2)) the tenant has all the protection of subsection (1). He has the protection of the Minister, whose consent the landlord must obtain before the notice to quit can have any effect. When one looks at subsection (2) (d) it will be observed (as indeed Birkett L.J. observed in Budge v. Hicks [8]) that it is required that if the reason for giving notice comes under any of these paragraphs, that reason must be so stated in the notice.

Two months after Cowan v. Wrayford [9] was decided Jones v. Gates [10] came before the Court of Appeal and there the landlord had tried to exclude the tenant from exercising his rights under section 24 (1) by stating that the land was " required for a use, " other than for agriculture," which is paragraph (b) of sub-section (2). It turned out, as the facts emerged, that all that the landlord had was an idea that the land might be useful and attractive to anybody who was going to promote a sports ground, but there were no definite arrangements ever arrived at between the landlord and anybody else that it would be taken over as a sports ground. The county court judge was not satisfied that the holding was required for such a purpose and that decision was upheld by the Court of Appeal. I have looked very carefully at paragraph (d) of section 24 (2) and indeed, if technicalities are to prevail, they are available, of course, for use not only by the tenant but also by the landlord. My attention has been drawn to the strict wording of the paragraph and in so far as the rent is concerned, it does say that " at the date of the giving of the notice " to quit the tenant had failed to comply with a notice in writing " served on him by the landlord requiring him within two months " from the service of the notice to pay any rent due in respect of " the agricultural holding to which the notice to quit relates . . ." All I have to go upon—and I have nothing before me to indicate that that paragraph was ever complied with as far as the two months' notice is concerned—is the wording of the first of the reasons, which indicates that what happened between the parties was that the landlord demanded of the tenant to pay the rent, and that is exactly what the tenant did not do. There had, therefore, been no two months' notice served as required by paragraph (d). The plaintiff served a counter-notice under section 24 (1) and the procedure under that Act came into operation by the defendants applying for the Minister's consent on October 15, 1954. That consent was duly given on June 10, 1954, the Minister having given due consideration to the circumstances of the case, because as I read his decision, he referred, first, to the non-payment of the rent by the tenant in breach of the terms of tenancy, and, secondly, to the tenant's failure to keep the farm property and appurtenances in good tenantable repair. Thirdly, there was a breach of the agreement. I do not think the Minister referred to that, but I have to look at the reasons given in that notice, and having given careful consideration to all this I hold that this notice was not invalid and the reasons given did not come within any of the paragraphs of subsection (2).

The first reason which was given was the non-payment of rent by the tenant in breach of the terms of the tenancy. Secondly, the plaintiff failed to keep the farm property and appurtenances in good tenantable repair. Thirdly, there had been an agreement to repay money spent by the landlords on the tenant's behalf, and, as I read the correspondence, this matter was the subject of discussion in an exchange of letters between the solicitors acting for both parties. The solicitors for the tenant asked the landlords' solicitors why they gave reasons at all, and the landlords' solicitors said that they gave reasons because they thought it was only courtesy to let the tenant know that he was being called upon to give up possession of the farm at due time, which, incidentally, was more than a year ahead, by reason of non-payment of rent, non-payment of a sum of money due, and not keeping the farm in good and tenantable repair. It is perfectly true that in the tenant's counter-notice the words "without "prejudice" are contained, and they are also in a letter dated October 23, 1954, in which the tenant said that his appearance before the Agricultural Committee would be entirely without prejudice to his right to contend in another place that his notice to quit, which he received, was invalid. He has contended it here and I am not prepared to hold that he was estopped from putting that contention forward. When I look at the pleadings I find that in the reply it is put forward that the Minister had no jurisdiction to entertain the case at all, but I have not heard that emphasized in this court.

It is only right to indicate that my attention has also been called to more than one case which dealt with the validity of notice. In Norfolk County Council v. Child [11] Avory J. said, in giving the judgment of the court consisting of himself and Lawrence J.[12]: "I think the decisions upon the point establish that "the test to be applied in either case is whether it is so vague "or uncertain that it is unsafe for the tenant or landlord, as the "case may be, who receives the notice to act upon it," and they cited Gardner v. Ingram,[13] in which Bowen L.J. said [14] "The "tenant used language on which the landlord could not safely "act." Of course, if a notice to quit is ambiguous, and in a case where it is given from landlord to tenant the tenant cannot make head nor tail of it, or there may be difficulty in understanding what the tenant ought to do, there may be all kinds of things in a notice to quit which may puzzle the tenant or one given by the tenant might well puzzle the landlord. I have come to the conclusion that this notice is not in the least bit ambiguous. He is told, and he knows he is told, to quit this agricultural holding by the end of the year following the giving of the notice. As a matter of courtesy the landlords' solicitors have added the reasons why he has to get out. He has not paid his rent, which is a matter of considerable interest to both sides one would think. He is told that he has not kept the property and appurtenances in good and tenantable repair, and he signed an agreement in which he said that he would. What is more, when the landlords have spent a considerable sum of money in putting the farm buildings into good repair, and he entered into an agreement whereby he would repay the landlords the money they had spent, he has not paid them. I hold that this case does not come within section 24 (2).

When the counter-notice was served, the Minister came to the conclusion that this did not come under section 24 (2) but under section 24 (1), and he gave his consent to the notice to quit being

[Plaint No. L.O. 207.]

Contract—Consideration—Promise to perform existing duty—Illegitimate child—Promise by father to pay weekly sum to mother so long as child well looked after—Child thereafter maintained by mother—Mother bound in law to maintain child—Whether consideration for father's promise.

After the parents of an illegitimate child had lived together for some years, the father turned the mother out, himself retaining the child. Later the father made an offer to let the mother have the child and to pay an allowance of £1 per week, provided that the child was well looked after and happy. The mother took the child away and maintained it accordingly. When, some months later, the mother married, the father discontinued the payments. In an action by the mother to enforce the continuance of the payments:—

Held, that, though the mother was bound by the provisions of the National Assistance Act, 1948, to maintain the child, there was good consideration for the father's promise.

Hicks v. Gregory (1849) 8 C.B. 378 followed.

APPEAL from His Honour Judge Shove, sitting at Lincoln County Court.

The facts are stated in the judgment of Denning L.J.

G. D. Lane for the father.

H. A. Skinner for the mother.

Case cited in argument not mentioned in the judgments: Smith v. Roche.[1]

DENNING L.J. This is a claim for the sum of £1 a week in respect of the maintenance of a bastard child. The father and mother lived together unmarried for four or five years, from 1949 until May, 1954, and a little girl was born of that union on October 28, 1950. Whilst the father and mother were living together, the father went out to work and maintained the household. But in May, 1954, the father turned the mother out. He put the child into the care of a neighbour and paid the neighbour

[1] (1859) 6 C.B.(N.S.) 223.

£1 a week. The mother meanwhile found work as a housekeeper to a man who was ready to let the child come too. The mother wanted the child with her, and she wrote a letter to the father asking for Carol, the child, and £1 a week for her maintenance, which was the sum which the father had been paying the neighbour. We have not got a copy of the letter which the mother wrote, but we have the father's reply, which is the basis of this action. It is dated July 27, 1954, and says: "Mildred, I am "prepared to let you have Carol and pay you up to £1 per week "allowance for her providing you can prove that she will be well "looked after and happy and also that she is allowed to decide "for herself whether or not she wishes to come and live with "you. She is well and happy and looking much stronger than "ever before. If you decide what to do let me know as soon as "possible." On receiving that letter the mother went to see the father, and it was agreed that she could have the child. She took the child with her, and the child has lived with the mother ever since.

In February, 1955, some seven months later, the mother married the man to whom she had been acting as housekeeper; and a few weeks later the father himself married. The father kept up the payments of £1 a week until the mother married, but after that he stopped.

I look upon the father's letter as dealing with two things. One is the handing over of Carol to the mother. The father agrees to let the mother have the child provided that the child herself wishes to come and provided also that the mother satisfies the father that she will be well looked after and happy. The other thing is the future maintenance of the child. The father promises to pay the mother up to £1 per week so long as the mother looks after the child.

The mother now brings this action, claiming that the father should pay her £1 per week, even though she herself has married. The only point taken before us in answer to the claim is that it is said that there was no consideration for the promise by the father to pay £1 a week: because the mother, when she looked after the child, was only doing that which she was legally bound to do, and that is no consideration in law. In support of this proposition, reliance was placed on a statement thrown out by Parke B. in the course of argument in Crowhurst v. Laverack.[1]

It is quite clear that by statute the mother of an illegitimate child is bound to maintain it: whereas the father is under no such obligation. (See section 42 of the National Assistance Act, 1948.) The mother can, of course, if she is a single woman, apply to the justices for an affiliation order against the father: and it might be thought that in this case consideration could be found by holding that the mother must be taken to have agreed not to bring affiliation proceedings against the father. But the mother

v.
BYHAM.
Denning L.J.

in her evidence said that she never at any time had any intention of bringing affiliation proceedings. It is now too late for her to bring them, because she has married and is no longer a single woman.

I approach the case, therefore, on the footing that the mother, in looking after the child, is only doing what she is legally bound to do. Even so, I think that there was sufficient consideration to support the promise. I have always thought that a promise to perform an existing duty, or the performance of it, should be regarded as good consideration, because it is a benefit to the person to whom it is given. Take this very case. It is as much a benefit for the father to have the child looked after by the mother as by a neighbour. If he gets the benefit for which he stipulated, he ought to honour his promise; and he ought not to avoid it by saying that the mother was herself under a duty to maintain the child.

I regard the father's promise in this case as what is sometimes called a unilateral contract, a promise in return for an act, a promise by the father to pay £1 a week in return for the mother's looking after the child. Once the mother embarked on the task of looking after the child, there was a binding contract. So long as she looked after the child, she would be entitled to £1 a week. The case seems to me to be within the decision of Hicks v. Gregory,[2] on which the judge relied. I would dismiss the appeal.

MORRIS L.J. I agree. I think that the letter of July 27, 1954, shows that there was consideration for the agreement and promise of the father. After the mother was made to leave the home in May, 1954, the child in fact stayed with the father until July. The terms of the father's letter of July 27 suggest that he was animated by a concern for the well-being of the child. The phrases that he uses are, I think, evidence of that. When the mother asked for the child, the answer was in the terms of the letter. Mr. Lane submits that there was a duty on the mother to support the child; that no affiliation proceedings were in prospect or were contemplated; and that the effect of the arrangement that followed the letter was that the father was merely agreeing to pay a bounty to the mother.

It seems to me that the terms of the letter negative those submissions, for the husband says "providing you can prove "that she"—that is Carol—"will be well looked after and happy "and also that she is allowed to decide for herself whether or not "she wishes to come and live with you." The father goes on to say that Carol is then well and happy and looking much stronger than ever before. "If you decide what to do let me know as "soon as possible." It seems to me, therefore, that the father was saying, in effect: Irrespective of what may be the strict legal position, what I am asking is that you shall prove that Carol

1956
Parker L.J.

will be well looked after and happy, and also that you must agree that Carol is to be allowed to decide for herself whether or not she wishes to come and live with you. If those conditions were fulfilled the father was agreeable to pay. Upon those terms, which in fact became operative, the father agreed to pay £1 a week. In my judgment, there was ample consideration there to be found for his promise, which I think was binding.

PARKER L.J. I have come to the same conclusion. I think that the letter of July 27, 1954, clearly expresses good consideration for the bargain, and for myself I am content to adopt the very careful judgment of the county court judge.

Appeal dismissed.

In 1940 certain property in the Metropolitan Borough of Poplar was in a dangerous state of disrepair, and under powers conferred by the London Building Acts (Amendment) Act, 1939, the London County Council repaired the property. In 1941 the property was totally destroyed by enemy action and qualified for a value payment under the War Damage Act, 1943, which was subsequently fixed by the War Damage Commission at £3,735. In 1943 the London County Council obtained orders under section 70 of the London Building Acts (Amendment) Act, 1939, fixing the cost of repairs which the council were entitled to recover at £207 7s. 11d., and directing that no part of the property, if repaired or rebuilt, should be let for occupation until after payment to the council of this sum. These orders were duly registered as local land charges.

In 1944 the council made a compulsory purchase order acquiring the property, and this order was subsequently confirmed by the Minister. In 1945 the council served a notice to treat on the respondent who claimed to be at all material times the owner of the property. The respondent failed or neglected to prove his title to the property and accordingly in 1955 the council paid compensation moneys of £3,735 into court under section 76 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and vested the land in itself under section 77 of this Act. The council now claimed payment out of court of the sum of £207 7s. 11d. in respect of the cost of repairs:—

Held, (1) that the orders obtained under section 70 of the London Building Acts (Amendment) Act, 1939, being incumbrances of a kind required by Schedule II, paras. 1 and 2 of the War Damage Act, 1943, to be taken into account in ascertaining the value of a hereditament, were incumbrances within the terms of Schedule VIII, para. 1 (1) and (3) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1944,[1] and that accordingly the amount of compensation moneys paid into court under section 76 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845,[2] should not have included the sum of £207 7s. 11d. due to the council under those orders.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

The facts are taken substantially from the judgment. The respondent, John Segar, claimed to be, and to have been at all material times, the owner in fee simple of certain properties in Grace Street, Stratfield Road and Talwin Street in the Metropolitan Borough of Poplar, though he had never proved his title thereto. In 1940 some of these properties were in a dangerous state of disrepair, and, under powers conferred by the London Building Acts (Amendment) Act, 1939 (hereinafter called "the "Act of 1939"), the applicant, the London County Council (hereinafter called "the council"), did certain works of repair to render the properties safe. In March, 1941, the properties suffered damage through enemy action, and were later classified as a total loss, which qualified them for a value payment under the War Damage Act, 1943. The amount of this value payment was subsequently fixed by the War Damage Commission at £3,735. In October and November, 1943, the council obtained nine orders under section 70 of the Act of 1939 fixing the costs which the council were entitled to recover from the owner at £207 7s. 11d., and directing that no part of the dangerous structure, if repaired or rebuilt, should be let for occupation until after payment to the council of this sum. The orders were duly registered as local land charges in the register of the council.

Note: The above words were added by the Schedule to the Law of Property (Amendment) Act, 1926 (16 & 17 Geo. 5, c. 11).

In 1944 the council made a compulsory purchase order acquiring, amongst other properties, the properties in question, and this order was confirmed by the Minister on April 25, 1945, by an order entitled "The County of London (Devons Road, Poplar) "Housing Confirmation Order, 1945." On November 16, 1945, the council served a notice to treat on the respondent. The respondent either failed or neglected to prove his title, and accordingly, on October 12, 1955, pursuant to section 76 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, the council paid the sum of £3,735 into court to the ledger credit "Ex parte the London "County Council, the account of John Segar or other the owners "or owner of the freehold interest in land being . . . ," and then setting out the properties. The council then proceeded to vest the land in itself under section 77 of the said Act.

The council now sought by this application to have paid out of court to itself the sum of £207 7s. 11d. expended by it in putting the premises then standing on the sites in question into a state of safety.

The following case, not referred to in the judgment, was cited in argument: In re City of London Property Co. Ltd.'s Appeal.[4]

Cur. adv. vult.

March 22, 1956. Upjohn J. read the following judgment. [His Lordship stated the facts, as set out above, and continued:] The first question which I have to determine is whether the council have a charge upon the properties in respect of their expenditure. That depends upon section 70 of the Act of 1939, which I must now read. [His Lordship then read the section and continued:] It is unfortunate that, unlike sections in earlier comparable Acts—for example, section 257 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and section 13 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892—subsection (1) imposes no charge in express terms upon the property enabling the council to recover the expenses incurred as though it was a mortgagee for that amount.

Subsection (2) (b) of section 70 appears to proceed upon the footing that registration under the Land Charges Act, 1925, puts the council in the position of a mortgagee, but it is important to observe that the subsection in itself created no charge. If the section proceeds upon an erroneous view of the law it cannot be construed otherwise than in its ordinary meaning so as to attain the result which it is thought was achieved by registration under the Land Charges Act; if the view be truly erroneous the section has misfired: Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Ayrshire Employers Mutual Insurance Association Ltd.[1] and Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Dowdall O'Mahoney & Co. Ltd.[2]

The Land Charges Act can only operate to impose a charge if the last paragraph of section 15 (1), a paragraph inserted by the Law of Property Act (Amendment) Act, 1926, does so. That paragraph is in these terms. [His Lordship read the paragraph and continued:] It only creates a charge if successive owners are liable, and section 66 of the Act of 1939 only provides that the expenses incurred shall be paid "by the owner of the structure." I am not convinced that that section imposes on successive owners any obligation to pay, though no doubt subsequent owners will do so where the charge has been registered as the price of being permitted to develop the land.

Whatever my doubts may be as to whether section 70 in fact achieves its object of conferring a charge enabling the chargee to exercise all the powers of a mortgagee to recover the expenses incurred, there can be no doubt that the council, having registered their charge, had a good equitable charge in the nature of a restrictive covenant enabling it to prevent any letting of any building rebuilt on the site until the amount of the expenses and costs is paid.

On that footing Mr. Bridge submits that a mistake has been made; too much has been paid into court, and the council, he says, now has no right to obtain payment out of any part thereof.

This argument, which involves a review of some complicated statutory provisions, may be stated thus.

Upon a compulsory purchase of land which has qualified for a value payment under the War Damage Act, 1943, the value is to be that certified by the War Damage Commission—see the Town and Country Planning Act, 1944, Schedule VIII, para. 1 (1)—and this sum has been certified to be the sum of £3,735 mentioned earlier in this judgment. That provision, however, is subject to the qualification contained in paragraph 1 (3) (b) of Schedule VIII, that where there is a material difference between the incumbrances to which the property was subject at the time of the war damage and the incumbrances to which it was subject at the date of the notice to treat, being incumbrances of a kind required by the War Damage Act to be taken into account in ascertaining the value of the hereditament, then where the incumbrances have increased such increase must be deducted from the previously ascertained value by the War Damage Commission.

To ascertain what incumbrances must be taken into account for the purposes of the War Damage Act reference must be made to paragraph 1 of Schedule II to that Act, which provides that the hereditament is to be valued as on a sale made in the open market with vacant possession subject (inter alia) to any restriction imposed by or under any enactment passed before the War Damage Act, 1941, to which the hereditament was subject at the time immediately after the occurrence of the war damage.

The charge created by the orders made under section 70 of the Act of 1939 came into effect after the war damage, but before the notice to treat. Consequently it is argued that at the time of the notice to treat the land should have been valued subject to the right of the council to restrict development until its costs and expenses have been paid. It can hardly be doubted that that right ought to be evaluated at £207, the amount of the expenses, and so it is said that the value of the interest of the vendor in the land which was being acquired was £3,735 less £207, that is, £3,528, and too much has been paid into court. I accept that argument.

It is then urged that payment into court under section 76 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act and vesting of the land by the council in themselves under section 77 of that Act operate as a statutory conveyance of the property; the money has been paid into court to the credit of the owner, and if too much has been paid in it is as though too much had been paid to the vendor by mistake and the council has no equity or title to claim repayment of any sum so overpaid. That is a formidable argument, but it overlooks the powers given to the court under sections 76 and 78 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.

Section 76 empowers the acquiring authority, in the circumstances therein mentioned, to pay the purchase-money into court "subject to the control and disposition of the court."

Section 78 is in these terms. [His Lordship read the section and continued:] That section confers a wide discretion upon the court in ordering payment out. The facts are clear. The value of the interest of the respondent which was acquired by the council was £3,528, and too much by £207 has mistakenly been paid into court. That sum was properly expended by the council pursuant to its statutory powers and duties. It is recoverable as a debt from the respondent though that right may now be statute-barred. The difficulty has arisen solely because of the neglect or failure of the respondent to make a title. No question could have arisen if he had made a title, and the matter completed in 1945.

It seems to me that in those circumstances the discretion of the court can only be exercised in one way, namely, by ordering payment out to the council of the money they mistakenly paid in rather than in permitting the respondent to receive an admitted and entirely unmerited windfall, which has come about solely through the circumstance of his own failure or neglect to make title.

Order accordingly.

The Senior Registrar, after consultation with the masters of the Supreme Court Taxing Office, is of opinion that under present conditions it is more appropriate to treat Polish upon the same basis as French, German, Spanish, etc., than as an "other "language" (Annual Practice, 1956, p. 1483) for the purpose of fixing the rate allowed on taxation for translations. He is also of opinion that the employment of a translator as an intermediary between a Polish assisted party and his own solicitor requires to be strictly justified, and should in any event be kept to a minimum. In particular, the translation of simple letters (such as "writing petitioner to call") from a solicitor to a Polish client resident in England should seldom be necessary.

The petitioner was convicted together with one B. of conspiring, between March and November, 1950, with M. and other persons unknown to break and enter a dwelling-house and steal jewellery, and of breaking and entering that dwelling-house on November 5, 1950, and stealing jewellery. At the trial M. gave evidence of meetings which he had had with the petitioner and B. on occasions in August, September and early October, 1950, and he said that the petitioner, he thought in September, had suggested that he should assist them to steal the jewellery by giving certain information; M. also said that he had had a meeting with the petitioner and B. a week before the robbery, and that on the evening of November 4 he had, by arrangement with the petitioner and B., unfastened a catch on a bedroom window in the dwelling-house. The Court of Criminal Appeal dismissed an appeal by the petitioner and the petitioner, alleging that his passport, in force in 1950, showed that he had been absent from the country between July 13 and October 19, 1950, petitioned the Home Secretary, contending that, had the passport been before the jury at the trial it would have shown the evidence of M. to be untrue in a material matter and he might well have been acquitted. The Home Secretary referred the case to the Court of Criminal Appeal under section 19 (a) of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907. The petitioner's passport had in fact been available at the trial, but had not been called for by the petitioner, nor was it suggested by him that he was abroad during the summer of 1950. At the hearing of the reference the petitioner gave no acceptable reason for his failure to mention at the trial that he had been abroad, and objection was taken by the Crown to the admission of the passport as evidence on the ground that on such a reference the court should follow the same procedure as on an ordinary appeal and that, therefore, its reception as fresh evidence was precluded by the rule of practice that the court would not receive fresh evidence unless it was shown that it had not been available at the trial:—

Held, that whether or not the court would admit fresh evidence on a reference under section 19 (a) was a matter that must depend on the merits of each case, and that it was undesirable that criminals should be encouraged to attempt to get fresh evidence before the court as the result of a petition and a reference by the Home Secretary, but the court would not treat itself as bound by the rule of practice if there was reason to think that to do so might lead to an injustice, or to the appearance of injustice, and that, lest the impression might arise that a review of the petitioner's case had been refused for a purely procedural reason, the court would look at an agreed schedule of the entries in the passport.

Rex v. McGrath [1949] 2 All E.R. 495 and Rex v. Collins (1950) 34 Cr.App.R. 146 considered.

Held, further (on the merits), that the appeal must fail, for in the face of the whole of the evidence it was impossible to say that if M. had been shown to be wrong in his reference to the meetings in August and September, the jury would or might well have acquitted the petitioner.

Reference by the Home Secretary.

The petitioner, Victor George Sparkes, was charged at Surrey Quarter Sessions on April 25, 1952, together with one, Albert Charles Burley, on an indictment containing two counts; the first count alleged a conspiracy between March and November, 1950, with one Duncan McLeod and other persons unknown to break and enter a dwelling-house of the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland and steal their jewellery, and the second count alleged breaking and entering that dwelling-house on November 4, 1950, and stealing jewellery. Both the petitioner and Burley pleaded not guilty, but the jury convicted each of them on both counts and the petitioner was sentenced to five years' imprisonment. On July 21, 1952, the Court of Criminal Appeal heard and dismissed an appeal against conviction brought by the petitioner on the ground of misdirection, and he duly served his sentence.

At the trial McLeod, who at the material times had been employed as butler by the Duke of Sutherland, gave evidence for the prosecution to the effect that he had had various meetings with the petitioner and Burley on occasions in August, September and early October, 1950, and that the petitioner, he thought in September, had suggested that he should assist in the robbery, and had asked him if he would give information which would help in stealing his employers' jewels. McLeod also gave evidence to the effect that he met the petitioner and Burley a week before the robbery, when he gave them information about the movements of the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland and that, on the night of the robbery, he had unfastened the catch of the Duchess's room.

Shortly before the petitioner's release after serving his sentence his passport in force for 1950 was returned to him, and the petitioner, alleging that he had been wrongly convicted, presented a petition to the Home Secretary, supporting it with the production of his passport. He contended that entries in the passport showed that he had been abroad between July 13 and October 19, 1950, and that, had it been before the jury at his trial, the passport would have shown that a material part of the evidence of McLeod was untrue and would have raised a doubt in the minds of the jury as to the credibility of McLeod, and he might well have been acquitted. The Home Secretary referred the case to the Court of Criminal Appeal under section 19 (a)[1] of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907.

At the hearing of the reference application was made for leave to call the petitioner in order to produce his passport. During the trial at quarter sessions the petitioner's passport had been in the hands of the police, who, prior to the trial, had received a letter from the defendants' solicitors asking that their passports should

The petitioner gave no reason for his failure to mention at the trial that he had been abroad, except that he forgot, and the Crown objected to the admission of the passport on the ground that on a reference by the Home Secretary under section 19 (a) the court should follow the same procedure as it did on an ordinary appeal and that, therefore, the admission of the passport was precluded by the rule of practice that the court would not receive fresh evidence unless it was shown that the evidence could not have been given at the trial.

Victor George Sparkes (hereinafter called "the appellant") was convicted at Surrey Quarter Sessions on April 25, 1952, together with one Albert Charles Burley upon an indictment containing two counts. The first count charged them with conspiring between March and November, 1950, with one McLeod and other persons unknown to break and enter a dwelling-house of the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland and steal their jewellery. The second count charged them with breaking and entering that dwelling-house on November 4, 1950, and stealing jewellery. The jewellery was worth some £50,000 and none of it has been recovered. The appellant and Burley pleaded not guilty. The jury found them guilty on both charges. Sparkes and Burley were each sentenced to five years' imprisonment on each charge, the sentences to be concurrent. Both prisoners appealed to the Court of Criminal Appeal, and their appeals were heard and dismissed on July 21, 1952. Burley later died in prison, having presented no petition to the Home Secretary alleging that he was wrongly convicted. The appellant served his sentence, but just prior to his release presented such a petition dated August 27, 1955, supporting it with the production of his passport in force in 1950.

The passport purports to show that the appellant was absent from the United Kingdom between July 13, 1950, and October 19, 1950. It is not a complete record of the appellant's movements, for it shows him entering Italy at a place on the French-Italian border in September, 1950, but bears no stamp showing that he left France on the same day. Again, when he left Italy, apparently on September 11, 1950, from the same place on the border, there is no record in the passport of his entry into France. But for the purpose of this appeal these discrepancies may be ignored, and the court will assume that the appellant was abroad from July 13, 1950, to October 19, 1950. Upon receipt of the appellant's petition, accompanied by his passport, the Home Secretary exercised his powers under section 19 (a) aforesaid to refer the matter to this court.

Two observations may be made at once. The first is that the period July 13, 1950, to October 19, 1950, is shorter in length than the period charged in the indictment as covering the time when the conspiracy was hatched. The period alleged in the indictment was "between March and November, 1950." The appellant was admittedly in this country during 1950 between March and July, and again from October 19 till December 21. The second observation is that he was admittedly in this country on the date of the robbery, which was November 4, 1950, and for a fortnight beforehand. Plainly, therefore, the fact that the appellant was abroad from July 13 to October 19, 1950, did not make it impossible for him to commit the offences of which he was found guilty; and the contrary is not contended by him.

What is said on his behalf is this: that if he was abroad for the period July to October, then certain evidence given against him at his trial could not be true; and if the jury had known this they might well have acquitted him instead of convicting him as they did. The evidence referred to was that of one Duncan McLeod. McLeod began employment as butler to the Duke of Sutherland in March, 1950, and was still his butler at the time of the robbery. The appellant had also been in the Duke's service in 1950 and earlier, as a chauffeur-valet, but he left in April, 1950. McLeod stayed on in the Duke's service, and in his evidence said that he saw the appellant frequently after April, 1950, and had drinks with him in London and Guildford.

C. C. A.

REGINA v. SPARKES.

Inquiries made by the police immediately after the robbery on November 4, 1950, led to no arrests. But in February, 1952, McLeod went to the police and made a full confession. In summary it was that he, the appellant, and one Burley had planned the crime. He said that at one of his meetings with the appellant after the latter had left the Duke's employ, he was asked by the appellant and by Burley to assist in the proposed robbery by giving necessary information about the lay-out of the house, and the Duchess's movements, and after consideration he agreed to do so. He was promised £8,000 as his share of the proceeds by Burley, but after the robbery he was told that there was a hitch and it would be £1,000. In fact he received £800 only in all, the first £50 of it, he said, from the appellant. He went on to describe how a week before the robbery he was told by the appellant and Burley that it was to take place on the following Saturday evening, and he gave information as to what room the Duchess would be using, where in the room the jewels would be, and he agreed to unfasten the latch of the window, which in fact he did. He had confessed, some sixteen months after the crime, through remorse. The jury at the trial, after being warned of the risks involved in acting upon the evidence of an accomplice, obviously accepted McLeod's confession as true and convicted both the appellant and Burley.

In the course of McLeod's examination-in-chief the following questions and answers appear:

"(Q.) Can you tell us about what date it was, the month of "that year, that you first met Burley? (A.) I should think it "was the latter part of August or the beginning of September.

"(Q.) Now on the other occasions when you met him, what "were the circumstances? (A.) We used to go for drinks "together.

"(Q.) You and who else? (A.) Sparkes.

"(Q.) And Burley? (A.) Yes.

"(Q.) On those occasions when you went for drinks together, "who paid generally? (A.) Burley, usually.

"(Q.) Now on one of those occasions was any suggestion made "to you by either of the two men? (A.) Yes.

"(Q.) First of all, who made the suggestion? (A.) Sparkes "made the suggestion.

"(Q.) In the presence of Burley or not? (A.) No.

" (Q.) Where was the suggestion made by Sparkes? (A.) At " 14 Cheyne Walk.

" (Q.) And about what date was that: can you give it " approximately? (A.) I should think it was in September, if " I remember rightly.

" (Q.) What was the suggestion that Sparkes made to you in " Cheyne Walk about September? (A.) He asked if I would " give some information which would help in stealing my " employers' jewels . . ."

The Deputy Chairman: " Now do you know which of the defendants mentioned £8,000 as your share. (A.) Burley.

" (Q.) Was that in Sparkes' presence or not? (A.) I cannot " remember whether Sparkes was there, not definitely."

Mr. Phipps: " Were you ever visited by either of them at " the house at Wilton Crescent? (A.) I was.

" (Q.) By which of them? (A.) By Sparkes.

" (Q.) Can you give us the month of that visit? (A.) I " should think it would be either the latter part of September " or the beginning of October."

What is now said on behalf of the appellant is that since his passport shows that he was out of the country in August and September the evidence of McLeod to the effect that he met the appellant in August or September cannot be right; and had this been brought out at the trial, McLeod's reliability as a witness would have been so shaken that the jury might well not have believed him at all; and it being McLeod's evidence which convicted the appellant, the conviction should now be quashed.

If one assumes in the appellant's favour that the passport had been produced at the trial, or that the appellant himself had averred (which he did not do) that he was abroad from July to October, 1950, and that the result was that the jury believed McLeod to be mistaken when he spoke of August or September as being, to the best of his recollection, the dates of his meetings with the appellant, there is still no reason to think that the result of the trial would, or might well, have been different. In the course of the appellant's cross-examination it was elicited that more than one statement had been made by McLeod to the police; and in re-examination one of these statements, made on February 23, 1952, was made an exhibit, and verified by McLeod. Part of it reads thus:

" I now remember that on the Sunday prior to Saturday, " November 4, 1950, ' Mike ' Burley and Sparkes came down to " Sutton Place by car. Sparkes had phoned me earlier and made " the arrangement. We met outside the gates of Sutton Place " and we drove to the Bell Public-house, Guildford, where I was " introduced to two women, one as Mrs. Burley and the other a " girl named ' Barbara ' who was Sparkes' girl friend. After " leaving this public-house, while we were outside, I told both " Burley and Sparkes that the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland " would be coming down to Gardens Cottage, Sutton Place, on " the following week-end. During the week following this I met " Sparkes and ' Mike ' Burley in the Horse and Groom Public- " house round the corner from 33 Wilton Crescent and I then " confirmed the fact that the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland " would be visiting Sutton Place on the following week-end. I " gave them the information as to where the ladder was kept and " which room the Duchess would be sleeping in at Gardens " Cottage. In fact I told them everything about the arrange- " ments. Burley then told me that they would come down after " dinner on the Saturday and that when I left the house to drive " the grey van up to the garage at the big house they would " know that the staff had left. They asked me to unfasten the " catch of the Duchess's bedroom window to make it easier for " them to enter the room and I agreed to do this. Sparkes " telephoned me some time on the Friday and told me that the " job was coming off on the following night and I agreed to carry " out the pre-arranged plan. The following day, which was " Saturday, November 4, 1950, I remember this because it was " ' firework ' night on this day, I carried on with my normal " duties. Dinner commenced that evening about 8 p.m. and " after one of the courses I went upstairs to put the Duke's " things out in his bedroom, that was my normal practice and " while I was there I went through to the Duchess's bedroom " and unfastened the catch on the bedroom window and then " looked to see if the Duchess's jewel cases were in their normal " place at the head of the bed and they were. I had previously " told Burley and Sparkes that the jewel cases would be in that " position in the bedroom because the Duchess had always put " them there on previous occasions. After this I went back " downstairs, carried on with my duties and after finishing my " work I left the cottage by the back door with the cook and " drove the grey van up to the big house. I did not go back to " the cottage again that night. About midnight that night the " night watchman woke me up at the big house and told me " that there were burglars at the cottage and I was wanted there " straight away. I dressed and went to the cottage where I was " seen by the police. I did not see ' Mike ' Burley or Sparkes " again or hear from them until after November 17, 1950, when " I left the Duke's employ and went to live at 1 Cottismore " Gardens, Kensington, where I had a room and where I was " employed as a butler. Sparkes knew I was going there. " Shortly after November 17, 1950, Sparkes and ' Mike ' Burley " came round to 1 Cottismore Gardens, Kensington, to see me. " We all went to The Connoisseur Club. The conversation then " was general, about the job going off all right and they told me " they would be giving me a share of the money later. On a " previous occasion when the job was being arranged, Burley told " me my share would be £8,000, but later he said that a ' snag ' " had occurred and my share would be about £1,000. He told " me this when we were discussing the possibility of a reward

" being offered. About Christmas, 1950, Sparkes handed me £50 " in £1 notes and at intervals I have received from him or Burley " various amounts in £50 and £25 lots, amounting in all to about " £800."

There is nothing in this statement which can be criticized as faulty recollection on the part of McLeod on the ground that the appellant was out of England at the time. He was admittedly in England, and he admittedly met McLeod and Burley at Guildford, though he puts the date as the 21st and not the 28th of October. Even, therefore, had the jury concluded that McLeod had been mistaken in his somewhat tentative recollection of earlier dates, they might well have concluded (and we think probably would) that he was telling the truth when he gave this detailed and circumstantial account of the meeting and of other events very shortly before the robbery—a meeting which Sparkes did not deny, though he put the date of it a week earlier. In the face of this evidence it is impossible to say that if McLeod had been shown to be wrong in his reference to meetings in August or September, the jury would or might well have acquitted the appellant.

One obvious question is why the appellant did not produce his passport at the trial. It was in the hands of the police but was nevertheless available to him at the hearing had he called for it. He could also have given evidence himself that he was abroad during the summer of 1950. He did not do so, and his explanation is that he forgot. It is impossible to believe this. He had been abroad for substantial periods in 1947, 1949, 1950 and 1951, if his passport accurately records his movements. Questions were put to McLeod by the appellant's own counsel to the effect that the appellant was abroad from June to August, 1951, and this information presumably came from the appellant. Could he in all the circumstances have forgotten that he was abroad during 1950 as well, when this was apparently the regular pattern of his life at that time? One possible reason for the appellant's reticence at the trial is that he realized it would not really help him to allege and establish that he was abroad from July until October 19, for this would not get rid of the damning evidence which McLeod could and did give about what happened at the meeting of the appellant with McLeod and Burley later in October. But the court need not speculate upon the matter; it is enough to say that the appellant has given no acceptable reason why at the trial he did not mention his absence abroad from July to October 19, 1950, but remained silent about it.

That circumstance led the Attorney-General to object to the court receiving the appellant's passport in evidence. He relied upon the well-established rule of practice that the court will not receive fresh evidence unless it is shown that the evidence could not have been produced at the trial, or that some point which could not have been foreseen arose at the trial upon which the evidence would have been material. The present is admittedly not such a case; and the Attorney-General argued that since the reference from the Home Secretary is to be treated in all respects as an appeal, the rule of practice precluded the reception of fresh evidence in the shape of the passport. In Rex v. McGrath,[1] however, the court indicated that different considerations arise where a case is referred to it by the Home Secretary under section 19 (a) of the Act; and in the circumstances of that case admitted fresh evidence. A similar course was followed in Rex v. Collins.[2] But no general rule applicable to all such cases is to be deduced from these precedents. On the one hand it might well be undesirable to stultify such a reference at the outset by a refusal to receive evidence which was available at the trial. On the other hand it is clearly undesirable to encourage astute criminals dishonestly to by-pass the court after conviction in the hope that fresh evidence, genuine or otherwise, might be got before the court as the result of a petition to the Home Secretary, and a reference of the matter by him to the court. Each case must, therefore, be decided upon its merits, although the court will not treat itself as bound by the rule of practice if there is reason to think that to do so might lead to injustice or the appearance of injustice. In the present case the court thought it better to look at the agreed schedule of entries in the appellant's passport, lest the impression might arise that a review of his case had been refused for a reason which was merely procedural.

C. C. A.

REGINA v. SPARKES.

One final point should be mentioned. It may be that the appellant personally did not break and enter the house and steal the jewels. It was not necessary to the Crown's case to prove that he did. If he conspired with Burley to steal them, as the jury found he did, then as an accessory before the fact he was just as guilty of the breaking-in and stealing effected in pursuance of that conspiracy as the person or persons who actually and physically committed the crime; and he could be tried, convicted and punished in all respects as if he were a principal felon: see the Accessories and Abettors Act, 1861.

For these reasons the appeal constituted by the reference to this court was dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

ON APPEAL FROM THE MEDICAL DISCIPLINARY COMMITTEE OF THE GENERAL MEDICAL COUNCIL.

Medical Practitioner — Medical Disciplinary Committee — Evidence — Charge of infamous conduct in professional respect — Alleged operation of abortion—Conviction in criminal court in Malaya—Admissibility in evidence of record of criminal proceedings—Statutory powers of Medical Disciplinary Committee—Desirability of alteration in Rules of Procedure—Medical Disciplinary Committee (Procedure) Rules, 1951 (S.I. 1951, No. 665), r. 63.

The appellant, a registered medical practitioner practising in Malaya, was charged before the Medical Disciplinary Committee of the General Medical Council with having, with intent to cause the miscarriage of a woman, unlawfully performed an operation of abortion which caused her death and thereby committed an offence under the Penal Code of the Federation of Malaya of which he was convicted in the High Court of Malacca (the conviction being affirmed on appeal), and having in relation to those alleged facts been guilty of infamous conduct in a professional respect. The evidence adduced before the Disciplinary Committee in support of the charge consisted of the record of the hearing in the High Court of Malacca "edited" by the deletion of certain passages in the evidence which the legal assessor sitting to advise the committee considered would not be admissible in a criminal court in England, and certain further passages at the request of the appellant's solicitor. The summing up of the judge at the trial was also omitted. While agreeing that the documentary evidence was admissible, it was contended for the appellant that the witnesses who had given evidence at his trial should be called to give oral evidence before the committee. The appellant was found guilty by the committee of infamous conduct in a professional respect and his name was directed to be erased from the register. On appeal by the appellant under section 20 of the Medical Act, 1950:—

Held, dismissing the appeal, that the record, with certain excisions, of the proceedings before the criminal court having been put in by consent as soon as the committee had decided, quite properly, that the attendance of the witnesses from Malaya was not practicable and that their absence did not vitiate the proceedings, that consent was fatal to any objection before the Board to the admission of the record. There had been no miscarriage of justice.

The observations in General Medical Council v. Spackman [1943] A.C. 627 at 634–637 and 645–646; 59 T.L.R. 412; [1943] 2 All E.R. 337 were applicable in this case—subject to the Rules governing the committee's procedure—where the conviction, not having taken place in the United Kingdom or the Republic of Ireland, was only prima facie evidence of the infamous conduct alleged.

ONG BAK HIN v. GENERAL MEDICAL COUNCIL.

The Disciplinary Committee as a domestic forum charged with the duty of making "due inquiry" into the circumstances attending the conviction in a distant country of a medical practitioner with a view to deciding—of which they alone were the judges—whether he had been guilty of infamous conduct in a professional respect, could not adequately perform that duty unless they were in possession of the whole of the proceedings in the criminal court in which the conviction occurred. The record of proceedings was a "document" within the meaning of rule 63 of the Medical Disciplinary Committee (Procedure) Rules, 1951, which provided that "The committee may . . . after consultation with the assessor "to the committee, treat any statement of fact contained in any "document as evidence of that fact." The admissibility of such documents was, however, limited to the statements of fact contained therein, and in the case of the record of proceedings in a criminal court would exclude the judge's charge to the jury and other parts of the record which it was desirable that the committee should see. It was desirable that there should be an alteration in the Rules of Procedure whereby the committee could be empowered beyond all question to receive in evidence and examine the whole of the officially authenticated proceedings of the convicting court in this class of case.

APPEAL (No. 50 of 1955) from a determination of the Medical Disciplinary Committee of the General Medical Council (November 25, 1955).

The following facts are taken substantially from the judgment of the Judicial Committee: In this case the appellant, Dr. Ong Bak Hin, who had been at all material times a medical practitioner registered under the Medical Acts, appealed to Her Majesty in Council under section 20 of the Medical Act, 1950, from a determination of the Medical Disciplinary Committee on November 25, 1955, that he had been guilty of infamous conduct in a professional respect and that the registrar be directed to erase his name from the register.

This determination was arrived at after an inquiry which had been held as a result of information as to the conduct of the appellant sent to the General Medical Council by the Director of Medical Services for the Federation of Malaya in accordance with rule 12 (2) (b) of the Medical Disciplinary Committee (Procedure) Rules, 1951 (S.I. No. 665 of 1951).

The conduct referred to in the information supplied to the council was to the effect that the appellant had been convicted and sentenced by the Supreme Court of Malacca on August 14, 1953, for performing an operation with intent to cause miscarriage which caused death contrary to section 314 of the Penal Code for the Federation of Malaya.

The formal charge before the Disciplinary Committee alleged that on May 18, 1953, the appellant, being registered under the Medical Acts, with intent to cause the miscarriage of Tee Bee Geok, unlawfully performed an operation of abortion which caused her death and thereby committed an offence under section 314 of the Penal Code of the Federation of Malaya of which he was convicted in the High Court of Malacca on August 14, 1953.

and sentenced to five years' imprisonment (reduced on appeal to two years), and concluded with the words: "And that in relation "to the facts alleged you have been guilty of infamous conduct "in a professional respect."

At the inquiry Mr. Widgery, a solicitor, appeared to place the facts before the committee, and the appellant was represented by Mr. Taylor, of Messrs. Hempsons, solicitors. The committee had the advice of a legal assessor.

The evidence adduced in support of the charge consisted of a statutory declaration by the registrar of the Court of Appeal for the Federation of Malaya to which were exhibited: (A) A certificate by the assistant registrar of the Supreme Court of Malacca of the conviction on August 14, 1953. (B) The record of the hearing in the High Court consisting of: (1) The charge. (2) Notes of evidence made by the trial judge. (3) Judge's reasons for sentence. (4) List of exhibits at the trial. (5) Statement of deceased woman dated May 22, 1953, being Ex. P.1 at trial. (6) Extracts from medical textbooks put in at trial. (7) Copies of notice and petition of appeal to Court of Appeal of Federation of Malaya. (8) Certified copies of order and judgment of Court of Appeal.

The copies of the record of the hearing in the High Court of Malacca provided for the members of the Disciplinary Committee had been "edited" by the deletion of certain passages in the evidence which the legal assessor considered would not have been admissible in a criminal court in England and certain further passages at the request of the appellant's solicitor. The summing up of the judge at the trial was also omitted.

The appellant appeared and gave evidence and was cross-examined at the inquiry. He contended, inter alia, that before he began the operation he believed that pregnancy had already terminated, and that the remnants had to be cleared. The whole purpose of the operation, he said, was thus limited, and the products of conception removed did not include any piece or pieces of a foetus.

At the conclusion the president announced the decision of the committee to the effect that the appellant was adjudged to have been guilty of infamous conduct in a professional respect and that the registrar had been directed to erase his name from the register.

ONG BAK HIN v. GENERAL MEDICAL COUNCIL.

Council of the Municipality of Brisbane v. Martin [2]; Har Prasad Singh v. Judges of the High Court at Allahabad. [3]

March 19. LORD OAKSEY announced that their Lordships would humbly advise Her Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed and that they would give their reasons later.

April 24. The reasons of their Lordships for dismissing the appeal were delivered by LORD TUCKER, who stated the facts set out above and continued: At the inquiry the appellant's solicitor submitted at the outset that justice could not be done to his client unless the witnesses who had given evidence at his trial were called to give oral evidence before the committee. He agreed that the documentary evidence was admissible, but contended that the committee in their discretion should exclude it in the interests of justice. He expressly stated that he did not ask for an adjournment. The legal assessor pointed out that the committee had no power to compel the attendance of witnesses from Malaya and advised the committee to proceed on the documentary evidence. Certain passages were then deleted or covered up at the request of the appellant's solicitor and in this form the record of the criminal proceedings was put in. The solicitors on each side drew the attention of the committee to such portions of the evidence as they considered relevant, but it was agreed that the committee should be at libery to look at any parts they wished and the desirability of the whole of the evidence of one of the witnesses, viz., Dr. Bennett, being read was stressed.

It was contended before their Lordships by counsel for the appellant that the proceedings at the inquiry outlined above were defective and not strictly in accordance with the rules of procedure to which reference will shortly be made, and that the determination of the committee should be set aside. He said that the notes of evidence given by Dr. Bennett should not have been received unless the committee were satisfied that an attempt had been made to secure his personal attendance and that he had refused to attend. He further submitted that if the notes of evidence were received they should all have been read out before the committee and that failing this the committee should have read the entire evidence themselves which, he said, they could not have done in the time available having regard to the length of the hearing and the short mid-day adjournment.

It will be convenient here to refer to the relevant sections of the Medical Acts and the Rules of Procedure made thereunder.

Section 29 of the Medical Act, 1858, as amended by the Medical Act, 1950, reads: "If any registered medical practitioner "shall be convicted by any court in the United Kingdom or the "Republic of Ireland of any felony, misdemeanour, crime or "offence, or shall, after due inquiry, be judged by the general

[2] [1894] A.C. 249. [3] (1931) L.R. 58 I.A. 152.

" council to have been guilty of infamous conduct in any pro- " fessional respect, the general council may, if they see fit, direct " the registrar to erase the name of such medical practitioner " from the register."

By section 14 of the Medical Act, 1950, the functions of the General Medical Council under section 29 of the Medical Act, 1858, were transferred to and became exercisable by the Medical Disciplinary Committee.

By section 16 of the Medical Act, 1950, the Medical Disciplinary Committee were required to make rules as to procedure and evidence, to be approved by the Privy Council. The Medical Disciplinary Committee (Procedure) Rules, 1951, were approved by Order in Council and are Statutory Instrument No. 665 of 1951.

Rule 28 of these Rules, under the heading " Cases relating to " conduct—proof of Charges," provides: " 28. In cases relating " to conduct where the practitioner appears, the following order " of proceedings shall be observed as respects proof of the charge " or charges:—(a) If a complainant appears, he shall open the " case against the practitioner. If no complainant appears, the " solicitor shall present the facts on which the complaint or " information is based. (b) Next the complainant, if any appears, " or, if no complainant appears, the solicitor shall adduce " evidence of the facts alleged in the charge or charges or such " of those facts as he is prepared to prove."

Rule 63 reads: " The Committee may receive any such oral " or other evidence as would be receivable in a court of law, and " in addition may, after consultation with the assessor to the " committee, treat any statement of fact contained in any " document as evidence of that fact."

The position of the General Medical Council in relation to its disciplinary powers under the Medical Act of 1858 was considered by the House of Lords in proceedings by way of certiorari in General Medical Council v. Spackman.[1] Viscount Simon L.C., after referring to section 29 of the Act of 1858, said[2]: " That " section draws a significant distinction between a case in which " the impeached practitioner has been convicted of felony or " misdemeanour and a case in which the allegation of infamous " conduct is not connected with a criminal conviction. In the " former case, the decision of the council is properly based on " the fact of the conviction, and the practitioner cannot go " behind it and endeavour to show that he was innocent of the " charge and should have been acquitted. In the latter case, " the decision of the council, if adverse to the practitioner, must " be arrived at ' after due inquiry,' and this of course means " after due inquiry by the council."

After referring to the refusal of the council to hear evidence tendered with a view to showing that the practitioner was not guilty of the adultery of which he had been found guilty by the Divorce Court, he proceeded [3]: "It is worth observing that this problem "does not arise only in connexion with conclusions reached in the "Divorce Court. A jury's verdict of justification in proceedings "for slander, judgment for the plaintiff in an action for seduction, "a bastardy order made by a bench of magistrates—all these, "and many other, instances of adverse conclusions reached in a "court of law might conceivably in certain circumstances lead "to a charge against a medical man of infamous conduct in a "professional respect. It seems obvious, in these other instances, "that, while the council might well treat the conclusion reached "in the courts as prima facie proof of the matter alleged, it "must, when making 'due inquiry' permit the doctor to "challenge the correctness of the conclusion and to call evidence "in support of his contention. . . . This does not mean that "the council has to rehear the whole case by endeavouring to get "the previous witnesses to appear before it, though in special "circumstances the recalling of a particular witness, in the light "of what the accused or his witnesses assert, may, if feasible, be "desirable. The council will primarily rely on the sworn "evidence already given at the trial."

Lord Atkin said [4]: "It is not disputed that where there has "been a trial, at least before a High Court judge, the notes of "the evidence at such trial and the judgment of the judge may "afford prima facie evidence in support of the charge. . . ."

Lord Wright said [5]: "The council very properly have treated "the decree of the Divorce judge as prima facie evidence. So "it is, and very strong evidence too, especially considering that "the respondent did not appeal but paid the £1,000 of damages "awarded against him." Later he said [6]: "Most of the cases "before the council must involve questions of fact which they "have to decide as best they can. It can only be in compara-"tively rare cases that the cause of complaint is a matter which "has been decided in a court of law other than by a conviction "for felony or misdemeanour. The decision of the court should, "indeed, ease that duty, because the proceedings and judgment "of the court at least give the council prima facie evidence "which may be for practical purposes unanswerable by the "practitioner. . . ."

That case concerned a finding of adultery which at that time was not conclusive. The law in that respect has now been altered, but the observations of the noble Lords in that case are—subject to the effect of the Rules of Procedure—in their Lordships' opinion applicable to such a case as the present where the conviction, not having taken place in the United Kingdom or the Republic of Ireland, is only prima facie evidence of the infamous conduct alleged.

In so holding their Lordships have not lost sight of the changes produced by the Medical Act, 1950, in the position of the Medical Disciplinary Committee, as compared with the General Medical Council under the Act of 1858, whereby they are now empowered to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of documents, to administer oaths, and are required to make rules as to procedure and evidence which have statutory force, and by which a right of appeal from their determination is given. They are, however, not a court of law but a domestic forum charged in certain cases, of which the present is one, with the peculiar duty of making " due inquiry " into the circumstances attending the conviction in a distant country of a medical practitioner with a view to deciding—of which they alone are the judges—whether he has been guilty of infamous conduct in a professional respect. This duty they cannot adequately perform unless they are in possession of the whole of the proceedings in the criminal court in which the conviction occurred. It would be unfortunate if they have precluded themselves from so functioning by the Rules which they have made, and in particular by rule 63. It is not easy to decide whether the whole of the proceedings in Malaya would have been " receivable in a court of law." No court of law in this country is charged with precisely the same function as that entrusted to the committee and the admissibility of documents may depend upon the precise issue before the court. The record of proceedings is, in their Lordships' opinion, a " document " within the meaning of the second limb of rule 63 (see the decisions under the Evidence Act, 1938—which it may however be noted does not apply to Scotland—in Edmonds v. Edmonds & Rogers,[7] Bullock v. Borrett,[8] and Barkway v. South Wales Transport Co.[9] The admissibility of such documents is, however, limited to the statements of fact contained therein, and such a restriction may render the task of the committee and legal assessor extremely difficult in dealing with the record of proceedings in the criminal court and would exclude the judge's charge to the jury and other parts of the record which it is clearly desirable that the committee should see.

In the present case the record, with certain excisions, was put in by consent as soon as the committee had quite properly decided that the attendance of the witnesses from Malaya was not practicable and that their absence did not vitiate the proceedings. The consent to the admission of the record is fatal to any objection on this score now being put forward before the Board, nor do their Lordships consider there is any substance in the contentions that the whole of the evidence was not read out in court or that it was incumbent upon the committee to read portions not considered by either side to have sufficient relevance to require the attention of the committee to be directed thereto.

Their Lordships desire, however, to draw the attention of those concerned to the desirability of an alteration in the Rules of Procedure whereby the committee can be empowered beyond all question to receive in evidence and examine the whole of the officially authenticated proceedings of the convicting court in this class of case.

For the reasons stated above their Lordships are of opinion that there has in this case been no miscarriage of justice and they have accordingly humbly advised Her Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed.

* LABONE v. LITHERLAND URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL. LIVERPOOL CO-OPERATIVE SOCIETY LTD. AND ANOTHER, THIRD PARTIES.

[1954 L. No. 2231]

Landlord and Tenant—Restrictive covenant—Shop—Lease of shop for "trade or business of bread and confectionery"—Lessors' covenant not to permit adjacent premises to be used for the trade or business for which the demised premises were let—Lease of adjoining premises to grocers—Sale of bread and confectionery by grocers—No breach of covenant.

The owners of a row of shop premises leased a shop to a master baker and confectioner the lessee covenanting not to carry on upon the demised premises "any trade or business whatsoever other than "that of bread and confectionery"; the lessors covenanting "not "to carry on or permit or suffer to be carried on by others upon "adjacent premises the trade or business for which the demised "premises are let." The lessors let adjacent premises to two grocers who, in the course of carrying on their businesses, sold bread and confectionery:—

Held, that the words "bread and confectionery" were descriptive of a class of trade or business and therefore the monopoly reserved to the lessee by the lease was that of the trade or business of a bread and confectionery shop, that is, a shop in which substantially only bread and confectionery is sold; accordingly, since there was not carried on upon the adjacent premises the trade or business of such a shop, the sale of bread and confectionery thereat was not a breach of the lessors' covenant.

Held, further, that even if the words, "trade or business of "bread and confectionery," be construed as meaning, "the trade "or business of selling bread and confectionery," the sale of bread and confectionery at a grocer's shop was not a breach of the lessors' covenant, since it would be wholly artificial to say that at a grocer's shop there is being carried on the trade or business of selling each substantial group of articles which a grocer commonly sells.

Per curiam: "The covenant, 'not to carry on the trade or "'business of selling bread and confectionery,' plainly is different "from a covenant, 'not to sell bread and confectionery by way of "'trade or business.' The latter covenant would be breached by "any sale (beyond, possibly, minimal quantities) of bread and "confectionery."

ACTION.

In February, 1953, the defendants, Litherland Urban District Council, who had previously developed a housing estate in the neighbourhood of Kirkstone Road North, invited tenders for the tenancy of shops in that road and published a list of businesses to which the shops would be allocated. The list comprised a number of businesses, among some of which there would inevitably be some overlapping with regard to the commodities which might be expected to be on sale in those shops; such, for example, as that between a chemist and a hairdresser in respect of toilet articles, and that between a butcher and a poulterer in respect of poultry. On March 3, 1953, the plaintiff, Leonard Stuart Labone, a master baker and confectioner, was informed that his tender "for the bread and confectionery shop" had been accepted and, by a lease dated November 9, 1953, he was granted a tenancy of the shop. By that lease the plaintiff covenanted: "not "without previous consent in writing of the landlords to carry "on or permit or suffer to be carried on in or upon the demised "premises or any part thereof any trade or business whatsoever "other than that of bread and confectionery, and, at all times "of the year during usual business hours of the locality, to keep "the demised premises open as a shop for carrying on the said "business"; the words "bread and confectionery" being written in ink in the typed form of lease. By a further clause in the lease the defendant council, the lessors, covenanted: "not "during the period of tenancy to carry on or permit or suffer to "be carried on by others in or upon the adjoining or adjacent "premises in Kirkstone Road North belonging to the landlords, "the trade or business for which the demised premises are let."

By leases dated October 7, 1953, and November 18, 1953, the tenancies of two shops allocated to the business of grocer were granted respectively to the Liverpool Co-operative Society Ltd. and to Gourley Bros. Ltd. The former shop was number 4, and the latter 30 Kirkstone Road North, and they were adjoining or adjacent to that demised to the plaintiff, which was number 22. The leases relating to nos. 4 and 30 were similar in their terms, both containing a lessee's covenant similar to that, set out above, contained in the plaintiff's lease, with the substitution of the word "grocer" for those of "bread and confectionery"; but neither lease contained the lessor's covenant contained in the plaintiff's lease. Following the execution of the leases both companies, as part of their grocery businesses, offered for sale bread and confectionery, such sales amounting in the case of the former company to some £25 or £30 per week, or about 2¼ per cent. of total sales, and in the case of the latter company to between £10 and £12 per week, or 1½ per cent. of total sales. In neither shop, however, was there any distinct section devoted to the sale of bread and confectionery.

In the Liverpool area—in which the shops were situated—the sale of bread and confectionery is part of the normal trade of a grocer. A firm of wholesale bakers and confectioners supplied 400 grocers in the area with bread and cakes; and of 48 grocers selected at random in the area only two sold neither bread nor cakes, whereas 43 sold both bread and cakes. The plaintiff's sales at the demised premises were distributed in value: as to 45 per cent. in bread (of which he baked 85 per cent.); as to 50 per cent. in cakes, and as to 5 per cent. in meat pies and the like.

The plaintiff brought this action claiming, inter alia, damages on the ground of breach by the defendant council of, inter alia, the lessor's covenant in permitting to be carried on at nos. 4 and 30 Kirkstone Road North the trade or business for which the premises demised to him were let. By third party proceedings the defendant council brought in the Liverpool Co-operative Society Ltd. and Gourley Bros. Ltd. The case is reported only on the question of whether there was a breach of covenant by the lessors.

Cur. adv. vult.

February 20. McNAIR J. read a judgment in which he stated the facts substantially summarized above, referred to the pleadings, and continued: On behalf of the plaintiff it was submitted that his rights in this action depend solely on the true construction of the terms of his own particular lease, and that in deciding the question of construction, the advertisement, the tenders, and the conditions of sale, in the absence of any plea for rectification, are irrelevant. This submission I accept as accurate.

Now, the breach alleged is a breach of clause 3 (1). By that clause the defendants undertake not to carry on or permit or suffer to be carried on by others, in or upon the adjoining or adjacent premises in Kirkstone Road North belonging to the landlord, the trade or business for which the demised premises are let. The "trade or business for which the demised premises " are let " is nowhere expressly defined, but it is common ground and, indeed, indisputable, that this expression means the trade or business of bread and confectionery. This is clearly a proleptic expression, since, strictly, " bread and confectionery " is not a trade or business, as is " chemist " or " grocer." On behalf of the plaintiff it is argued that the trade or business in question is the trade or business of selling bread and confectionery. In my judgment, the more natural or grammatical construction of the words " bread and confectionery " is to treat them as words of description, as words describing the class of trade or business. The class of trade or business, the monopoly of which is reserved to the plaintiff, is in my judgment the trade or business of a bread and confectionery shop, i.e., a shop in which substantially only bread and confectionery is sold—the trade or business of a shop, over the fascia of which one would find the words: " J. Smith, Bread and Confectionery." If this is correct as a matter of construction, then the claim of the plaintiff fails, for neither of the third parties is carrying on the trade or business of such a shop. Even accepting the plaintiff's contention that the trade or business of bread and confectionery means the trade or business of selling bread and confectionery, in my judgment the same result follows. The covenant " not to carry on the trade " or business of selling bread and confectionery " plainly is different from a covenant " not to sell bread and confectionery " by way of trade or business." The latter covenant would be breached by any sale (beyond, possibly, minimal quantities) of bread and confectionery.

To ascertain whether there has been, on the facts here admitted or proved, a breach of the covenant in the former form, that is, a covenant against carrying on the trade or business of selling bread and confectionery, one has to ask oneself whether, on the fair meaning of the covenant so expressed and according to the ordinary use of language, it can be said of either of the third parties that they carried on at their respective shops the trade or business of selling bread or confectionery. Though, no doubt, at the same premises two or more trades or businesses may be carried on, it is wholly artificial to say that at a grocer's shop there is being carried on the trade or business of selling each substantial group of articles which a grocer commonly sells. In ordinary parlance a grocer is carrying on the trade or business of grocer, and not carrying on the trade or business of selling tea, or the trade or business of selling tinned fruit, or the trade or business of selling bacon; nor, if he sells bread and confectionery, is he carrying on the trade or business of selling bread or confectionery.

In my judgment, even accepting the plaintiff's construction of this clause, his case fails on the facts. Although the result of this case must turn on the terms of the covenant, I am fortified in the conclusion I have reached by the reasoning of Simonds J. in A. Lewis & Co. (Westminster) Ltd. v. Bell Property Trust

McNair J.

Ltd.[1] In that case it was held that the sale of cigarettes in a tea-shop did not involve a breach of covenant against the use of the premises for the business of the sale of tobacco, cigars, and cigarettes. Two passages illustrate the view I have formed as to the construction of the material covenant in this case. The judge said[2]: "In my view, what is done at these premises is "the carrying on of the business of a tea-shop, and that involves, "amongst other things the sale of cigarettes. It is common— "indeed, I am told it is almost universal—that in tea-shops of "this character cigarettes should be sold. Accordingly, it "appears to me that it is no more right to predicate of this shop "that there is carried on there the business of the sale of "tobacco, cigars and cigarettes than to say of it that there is "carried on the business of the sale of milk, or the business of "the sale of confectionery. There is there carried on the usual "business of a tea-shop, which involves the sale of a number of "articles therein usually sold."

Referring to a syllogism for which Bowen L.J. was responsible, in Stuart v. Diplock,[3] Simonds J. said[4]: "In the present "case the syllogism which Bowen L.J. referred to would be: "'The business of the sale of tobacco, cigars and cigarettes "'consists in selling tobacco, cigars and cigarettes. The A.B.C. "'tea-shop sell cigarettes. Therefore, the A.B.C. tea-shop carry "'on the business of selling tobacco, cigars, and cigarettes.' "That, of course, is a fallacy. The tea-shop does not carry on "a business of a tobacconist or the business of selling tobacco, "cigars, or cigarettes because, as part of its business, it sells "cigarettes, any more than it carries on, in ordinary parlance, "the business of retailer of milk because, in the course of its "business, it sells milk, either in glasses or as an ingredient of "a cup of tea."

The conclusion which I have reached makes it unnecessary for me to express any final view on the alternative submission advanced by counsel for the defendants. [His Lordship referred to the submission, and continued:] In my judgment, accordingly, the defendants are entitled to judgment on the claim, and the third parties are entitled to judgment in the third party proceedings.

[His Lordship concluded his judgment by stating that had he been persuaded that the trade or business carried on by the third parties was in conflict with the rights conferred on the plaintiff by clause 3 (1) of his lease he would have held that the defendant council was in breach, as regards the second third party's activities, of the express covenant, and, as regards the first third Statutory duty—Whether civil right created—Accident not one against which legislation designed to protect.

The plaintiff, while in charge of a stranding machine in the defendants' wire-rope factory, was blinded in one eye by a particle of wire which flew out of the machine, which was not securely fenced. She sued the defendants for damages, alleging breach of statutory duty under section 14 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, and negligence at common law:—

Held, that the defendants, knowing that many similar accidents had occurred in which their employees had been struck in the face or other parts of the body by wire ejected from like machines, were negligent in failing to take reasonable measures to protect their employees from foreseeable risk, and the plaintiff was entitled to recover damages at common law.

Per Singleton and Morris L.JJ. Although the defendants were in breach of their statutory duty, under section 14 (1) of the Factories Act, securely to fence every dangerous part of the machine against the risk of contact, the duty did not extend to fencing against the risk of injury from dangerous material ejected from the machine. The defendants were therefore not liable to the plaintiff under that section, since the injury was not one against which it was designed to protect him.

of Viscount Simonds in Grant v. National Coal Board [1956] 2 W.L.R. 752, 754; [1956] 1 All E.R. 682 applied.

APPEAL from Pilcher J., sitting at Sheffield Assizes.

The plaintiff, Mrs. Nora Kilgollan, was employed by the defendants, William Cooke & Co. Ltd., as a strander in their wire rope factory at Attercliffe, Sheffield. She was in charge of a stranding machine, which was described by Singleton L.J., in his judgment, as follows: "a long machine, and the main part "of it is a barrel which revolves at considerable speed—over "800 revolutions a minute. Inside the barrel there were, at the "material time, some 18 bobbins, on each of which there was "wire, sometimes of very thin or small mesh and sometimes of "a little bigger mesh. The wire was drawn from the bobbins to "the end of the machine and the rotation of the barrel caused "it to be wound round a rope core in the process of making the "completed rope."

It was admitted that at times a wire would break and the loose end of it would fly out. It was the duty of the strander to stop the machine so that the wire could be mended. On January 22, 1955, while the plaintiff was in charge of the machine in question, a wire broke and a small particle flew out of the machine and struck her in the eye, penetrating the optic and lodging in the bone behind it. The sight of the eye was destroyed.

The revolving barrel was admittedly a dangerous part of machinery and therefore should have been securely fenced against contact under section 14 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937.[1] The upper part had been fenced with a wire mesh guard, but the lower part was not fenced, although the defendants had been recommended by a factory inspector to do further fencing.

The plaintiff brought the present action against the defendants, alleging that they were in breach of their statutory duty under section 14 (1) and also alleging negligence at common law. The trial judge found for the defendants and the plaintiff appealed.

J. F. Drabble Q.C. and Peter Stanley-Price Q.C. for the plaintiff.

The following cases were cited in addition to those referred to in the judgments: Dickson v. Flack[2]; Roe v. Minister of Health.[3]

SINGLETON L.J., having described the machine in question and stated the facts, continued: I have sought to describe the machine and the accident in as few words as I can, but I do not disguise that there are complications, and it is not very easy to follow completely what takes place inside the machine. A good deal of discussion has taken place upon what will happen or what does happen when a wire breaks inside the machine. It is said that frequently when that happens one end of the broken wire flails out under the guard and that it may, and sometimes does, strike the worker who is opposite the machine. I do not know that the expression that it "flails out" is the right one. Mr. Waller, for the defendants, prefers the description that it "lashes out." I should have thought that was rather a stronger description. But what is clear is that very often when there is a break one end of the wire swishes out under the guard, and that it sometimes strikes a workwoman. The worker in charge of the machine, as the plaintiff was, is called a strander. Let me make this clear: the guard upon the machine was not put there to deal with this kind of thing at all; it was a guard provided to prevent a strander, or any other workman or workwoman, coming into contact with a "dangerous part of machinery," either accidentally or inadvertently. None the less, it was admitted by the general manager of the defendant company that if there had been a guard of the kind that there should have been, for the purposes of section 14, the guard would have prevented an accident such as happened in this case.

Mr. Drabble, on behalf of the plaintiff, submitted that the accident arose through the defendants' breach of section 14 of the Factories Act, which, so far as material, reads: "Every "dangerous part of any machinery . . . shall be securely fenced "unless it is in such a position or of such construction as to be "as safe to every person employed or working on the premises as "it would be if securely fenced:" That is followed by a proviso to this effect: "Provided that, in so far as the safety of a "dangerous part of any machinery cannot by reason of the nature "of the operation be secured by means of a fixed guard, the "requirements of this subsection shall be deemed to have been "complied with if a device is provided which automatically "prevents the operator from coming into contact with that part." The proviso appears to give support to the argument of the defendants (which indeed has been approved in the House of Lords) that the object of the guard which has to be provided under section 14 is to prevent the operator from coming into contact "with that part"—that is, the dangerous part. The section ends with these words: "The Secretary of State may, as respects any "machine or any process in which a machine is used, make "regulations requiring the fencing of materials or articles which "are dangerous while in motion in the machine." The Secretary of State has not made any such regulations.

In Nicholls v. F. Austin (Leyton) Ltd.[1] these were the circumstances which had to be considered: "By section 14 (1) "of the Factories Act, 1937: 'Every dangerous part of any "'machinery . . . shall be securely fenced.' The last paragraph "of section 14 gave the Secretary of State power to 'make "'regulations requiring the fencing of materials or articles which "'are dangerous while in motion in the machine' but none had "been made. The appellant, while operating a circular saw "belonging to her employers, the respondents, was injured "through a piece of wood flying out of the machine which was "fenced so as to comply with the requirements of the Wood-"working Machinery Regulations, 1922, which by section 150 of "the Act were to be deemed to have been made under that Act." It was held by the House of Lords "that the respondents were "not in breach of any statutory obligation, since the obligation "to fence imposed by section 14, subsection (1), was an obliga-"tion to guard against contact with any dangerous part of a "machine and not to guard against dangerous materials ejected "from it, a matter depending solely on the making of regulations "under the discretionary power conferred by section 14 (3) on the "Secretary of State and not exercised by him."

Lord Thankerton said [2]: "My Lords, on consideration of the "terms of section 14, I am of opinion that there is a simpler "answer to the contention of the appellant, namely, that the "obligation to fence imposed by subsection (1) is an obligation "to provide a guard against contact with any dangerous part of "a machine, and that it does not impose any obligation to guard "against dangerous materials or articles ejected from the machine "in motion, that matter depending solely on the making of "regulations by the Secretary of State under the discretionary "power conferred on him by the last paragraph of the section. "This view appears to be amply confirmed by the language "used"; and (at p. 500) "I am of opinion that there is no "obligation imposed by section 14 on the respondents as regards "these flying bits of wood, and therefore they are not in breach "of any statutory obligation, and the appellant's main contention "fails."

The other law lords expressed the same view; and the law is that the respondents, in those circumstances, "were not in breach "of any statutory obligation, since the obligation to fence imposed "by section 14 was an obligation to guard against contact with "any dangerous part of a machine and not to guard against "dangerous materials ejected from it." In the present case, that which came out from the machine was a part of that which was being manufactured or put together in the machine: it was material being used in the machine; and upon the decision to which I have referred it is clear that this court cannot accede to the first part of the argument advanced by Mr. Drabble.

There have been, however, two other decision which I ought to mention. The first is a decision of the House of Lords in Carroll v. Andrew Barclay & Sons Ltd.[3] That was a case under section 13 of the Factories Act, 1937. The headnote reads: "The requirement of section 13 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, "that 'every part of the transmission machinery shall be securely "'fenced' imposes on occupiers of factories a duty to erect a "barricade to prevent any employee from making contact with "the machinery, and does not in ordinary cases oblige them to "erect an enclosure to prevent broken machinery from flying out "and injuring him. Quaere whether, in the case of a machine "which in working might be expected to throw off loose or broken "parts, there might be an obligation to fence it for the purpose "of protecting the workman against that danger." Lord Jowitt L.C., in his speech, reserved that question for decision; and Lord du Parcq said[4]: "I wish to add, however, that, while I agree "with Lord Normand that the words 'securely fenced' must be "given the same meaning in each of the three sections (sections "12, 13 and 14), I think that they may well mean 'so fenced "'as to give security from such dangers as may be reasonably "'expected.' If machines exist, or are hereafter invented and "used, which are dangerous because fragments or loose parts of "the machinery are sometimes ejected from them, then I am "not prepared to say that section 14 does not require such "machines to be fenced for the purpose of protecting workmen "against that danger. If the dictum of my noble and learned "friend Lord Simonds in Nicholls v. F. Austin (Leyton) Ltd.[5] "is to be understood as meaning that such a machine need not "be fenced, I respectfully doubt its accuracy, and must reserve "my opinion upon it"; and there is a comparatively recent decision of one division of the Court of Appeal which took the view expressed by Lord du Parcq. I need not go into it.

Mr. Drabble submitted, further, that the decision in Nicholls's case[5] did not cover the present case, by reason of the fact that in Nicholls's case it was found that there was no breach of the statute, whereas in the present case it was common ground that there was a breach, and though the breach was of something which was intended to prevent a man from falling against or coming into contact with a dangerous part of a machine, still, if, as a result of the breach, an accident of another kind was sustained by the plaintiff, the plaintiff can recover. I do not think that that is right, in the circumstances of this case, though I hope I may say that I have some sympathy with the argument.

I think, again, that this court is bound by the words of Viscount Simonds in Grant v. National Coal Board[6]: "My "Lords, where damages are claimed for breach of a statutory "duty without any allegation of negligence, the pursuer must "establish two things: first, that the breach is intended, not "only to be visited by a penalty but also to be the ground of "civil liability to a class of persons of whom the pursuer is one, "and, secondly, that the injury was one against which the "legislation was designed to protect him. The first of these "tests is undoubtedly satisfied in this case. No one questions "that a civil action for damages can be founded on a breach of "section 49. It is at the second test that, in my opinion, a real "difficulty arises, in which I am not prepared to differ from your "Lordships though I have been much pressed by the cogent "arguments to be found in the judgments under appeal." Viscount Simonds then referred to the case of Gorris v. Scott [7] and pointed out that it was quite different from the case before the House.

Mr. Drabble drew attention to the words of Lord Reid,[8] "But it seems to me to be a very different thing to say that, "where the object of the enactment is to promote safety, the "implication is that liability only arises if the breach causes "injury in a particular way"; and he submitted that this point was open to him under those words and from certain words in the speech of Lord Tucker. I do not think that the point is really open to this court, for the reasons I have given; though I have often thought—and I consider these two grounds put forward by Mr. Drabble together—that if there is a danger from something flying from the machine, a real danger which everyone knows, there is just as much reason to protect the workman from that danger as there is from his falling against the dangerous part of the machine. The employers knew that the machine ought to be guarded down below the place to which the mesh came. From the point of view of the Factories Act it does not matter whether they knew or not; but they knew. They had seen one other factory where a more complete guard was provided; they had been recommended before this accident took place to put on a deeper guard; they had contemplated doing it; but they had not done it at the time the action was heard—some two years later—except in regard to one machine. If they had done it, this accident would not have happened.

The form of guard which was recommended and which everyone agrees would give much greater protection to the workman from both points of view, is a guard which comes down from the place where the present wire mesh guard is, and covers all the rotating machinery and that part which is shown under it. The guard which it is intended to provide on all their machines at some time is a guard of sheet metal. As the machine is, one can see part of that which revolves down below the wire mesh, so that there was, at the time this accident happened, a risk of a strander being caught by the barrel as it revolved underneath the guard. And it is the fact, so we are told by the defendants' witness, that if the guard which it is proposed to put on had been there on the day of this accident a piece of wire could not have come out in the way that this piece did.

[His Lordship read from the evidence of Mr. Cockerill, general manager of the defendant company, as to how the accident happened, and continued:] It appears to me that both the witness and Pilcher J. accepted the plaintiff's witnesses' theory as to how the accident happened. What particular piece of the machinery the lashing end struck, no one can know, nor can anyone tell precisely what happens when an accident of this kind takes place. It must be theory. It is, however, clear that a piece did come from the broken wire, and that that was the cause of the accident to the plaintiff. She was somewhere near the machine, on duty.

The case put forward on behalf of the plaintiff under the common law is this: that the defendants knew of the risk of wire coming out, knew that people had been injured on many occasions through flailing or lashing wire, and that nevertheless they took no steps whatever to protect their workpeople against the risk of injury. It seems to me that if there is a risk of wire lashing—even though it be only a few feet—across a room where people are working, it is a risk which ought to be prevented if possible, or if feasible. That it is feasible is clearly admitted. Mr. Drabble submitted that as the defendants had taken no steps to avoid or to minimize the risk, they were negligent and in breach of their duty at common law.

The duty of an employer to his workpeople was stated by Lord Herschell in Smith v. Baker & Sons [9] in this way: "It is "quite clear that the contract between the employer and "employed involves on the part of the former the duty of taking "reasonable care to provide proper appliances, and to maintain "them in a proper condition, and so to carry on his operations "as not to subject those employed by him to unnecessary risk." The duty, I repeat, is, to take reasonable care.

In Nicholls v. F. Austin (Leyton) Ltd.[10] Lord Wright put the duty at common law in this way: "That the common law duty "exists in proper cases is unquestionable. But it is limited to "reasonable exercise of care and skill to guard against danger "which as reasonable people the employers ought to have "anticipated." I believe that those two citations cover every proposition which has been put forward by counsel in argument, though sometimes somewhat different words are used. The duty is no more than a duty to take reasonable care so as not to subject workpeople to unnecessary risk.

There had been, over the three years prior to this accident, a large number of accidents in this factory, and, in particular, in that part of it which is called the ropery, the part in which the plaintiff was working. The employers are under a duty of keeping an accident book, or books. There is one which is kept under the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946, and there is another which is kept under the provisions of the Factories Acts, 1937 to 1948. Those books which the defendants have contain particulars of accidents—perhaps I should say of some accidents. I add that because I asked Mr. Waller, this morning, what was the report, in either of the books, on the accident to a witness which occurred after the accident in this case—the witness who was struck by a piece of metal upon the forehead and the metal, she said, lodged under the skin in her forehead, and she went to the ambulance room. Mr. Waller said that there is no mention of that accident in the book, though there is of another accident to the same witness at some other time. It may be that the book is not complete.

I do not think anything ought to be made of that, perhaps. It is rather in what the books disclose that there is importance; and the evidence upon the matter is given by Mr. Cockerill. There were a great number of accidents—not accidents of a very serious character, but accidents which were reported and of which particulars are contained in the books. Furthermore, it is clear that a good many people in the company's employ who had accidents of a minor character did not report them; so that there are many more accidents in fact, Mr. Cockerill said, than appear in the books. The witness was asked: "Would she get struck "with wire in that position?"—that is, the position in which the plaintiff described that she was at the time of her accident—"Are operators struck with wire in that position?"—that is, with wire as distinct from a piece of wire or a little bit of wire—"(A.) They are, sir, yes. (Q.) With wire? (A.) With wire."

Pilcher J. asked him: "Operators do get struck? You "recognize that? (A.) They do get struck, but I have never "seen an operator in the whole of my experience walking up a "machine like that—walking along the length of the machine "and inspecting the work." It was pointed out that she had not said that, and he said: "They are provided with seats, and "they sit on a seat by the control and periodically inspect." I suppose that must mean that they go along the machine to look at the bobbins. Pilcher J. said: "Do not let us waste too much "time on it, because it is quite clear they do get flicked standing "in what I should say was a normal position by the ends of this "wire, but they in substance do not get hurt." Mr. Drabble asked: "We have extracted certain particulars from these books "for his Lordship to see, but am I right in saying that there "are scores and scores of cases of people reporting to the "ambulance room, reported in the accident book, with injuries "by wire to parts of the body other than the face? (A.) There "are, sir. (Q.) Scores of them? (A.) Yes, scores of them. "(Pilcher J.): From this room? (Mr. Drabble): A great many "of them from the ropery? (A.) From the ropery, yes, my Lord.

" Six hundred in those books." I think I am right in saying that that is over three years.

The judge asked him: " There are a great many reports in " the accident book of workers being—is it scratched or cut or " what? Do not trouble to look. You have just been through " it all. (Mr. Drabble): My Lord, there are punctures, incisions, " lacerations. (Pilcher J.): By wire? (Mr. Drabble): By wire, " my Lord. (Pilcher J.): In the ropery. I thought we need " worry about nothing except here (indicating list). Those are " accidents other than to the face?" Then it appeared that certain particulars had been taken out of the books by the plaintiff's advisers, dealing with accidents to the face; and there is a page which I have before me dealing almost altogether with accidents to the face, from September, 1950, to September, 1953. I think there are about 28, though they are not quite all accidents to the face. It was put at one time in the cross-examination that there were ten or twelve cases of accidents to the face.

Mr. Cockerill was asked about this. It had been said by one witness that she had complained to the chargehand. The chargehand was not called. The general manager was the only witness called on behalf of the defendants, and he was asked: " What " sort of number of people do you have reporting to the accident " room every week for injuries to any part of the body—face, " hands, legs—any part of the body, from wire in the ropery? " (A.) The exact number I could not give you, but considerable." Then the learned judge pointed out that it was a great pity that some little care had not been taken to have earlier discovery and to have full information as to what the books showed. I would like to express my agreement with him. We might have had this part of the case in much more convenient form. It took a long time this morning to find out what the accidents were and what was shown by the books. The witness said that if there had been side pieces on—that is, if the additional guard had been there—a very considerable number of minor accidents could have been prevented; he said there would not have been the injuries through flailing. He was asked about the ten cases which had come from somewhere, apart from those in the particulars. Of eleven (said counsel in cross-examination) there were ten that affected the face, and the witness said " Yes." " (Q.) Is this " the position? You do not know that any one of those ten was " in fact caused by a broken-off piece of wire flying over from " the stranding machine? You do not know that it happened " in that way? (A.) I do not know, no. (Q.) And you have " never heard it did happen in that way? (A.) I have not. " (Q.) But you do not know it did not happen in that way, either? " (A.) I do not." Pilcher J. said: " The injuries on the list to " the eyes and face of stranders may have been due to particles " of wire breaking off? (A.) Yes, my Lord. (Q.) That, you did " say, 'has never been reported to me'? (A.) That is quite " correct." A little later the judge said: " I have written down:

KILGOLLAN v. WILLIAM COOKE & CO. LTD.
Singleton L.J.

" ' There are in this list accidents to the eyes and face of " ' stranders in the ropery which may have been due to particles " ' of wire breaking off, but I cannot tell you whether they were.' " (A.) Yes. (Pilcher J.): Do you want to add anything to that? " (Mr. Drabble): No, I am perfectly happy."

The witness was then asked about the accident which was reported to Mr. Shires, the chargehand. Mr. Shires had been there since 1948. It was impossible to find out on the trial how any one of these accidents to the face or eyes or in the neighbourhood of the eyes had been caused. I do not regard that as satisfactory. The defendants have to keep records of accidents. Unless the accidents are reported to the factory inspector, or unless the factory inspector sees the book, he cannot know the cause of accidents arising in the factory; and of course for him to be able to know, the cause must be set out in the book, or he must be told by someone in charge. But there is nothing to show what the cause was; and the general manager (who, as I have said before, and I say again, was the only witness called on behalf of the defendants) said that he did not know how any of the injuries to the face were caused. A worker who gets a cut on the face or an abrasion could not well say whether it was done by a piece or by the wire itself which was lashing out.

The defendants, in a case of this kind, if they knew there were accidents, were under a duty to consider how those accidents could be lessened in number. They owed a duty to their workpeople; and it cannot be right, I think, for them to say: " Well, the " injuries were mostly cuts on the hand, or cuts on the legs, or a " scratch or abrasion on the body somewhere, and the people " were not off more than three days. Therefore, there was no " duty upon us to do anything: they were trivial injuries." That is not the right way of approach. The number in the accidents book alone is sufficient to show that something should have been done, and nothing had been done. So far as I know, no consideration was given to the question of injuries, or possible injuries, through flailing wire. Consideration was given to a further guard, but that was to stop people falling under, or into, the machine. The defendants, as employers, ought not to be content to allow a state of things to continue in which a large number of accidents to the hands or legs of the girls working there take place. It cannot be right to leave it like that.

One would have thought that it would occur to someone, " If there are all these accidents through flailing wire some day " we shall have a serious one." Suppose that at the time a break takes place the strander is stooping down a little, perhaps to do something to her foot. A flailing wire comes out: her eye is in danger. And again, if the flailing wire comes out below the guard and hits something on the way, what is more natural than that a bit of it should be broken off at or near the point at which the break has taken place? Those matters do not appear to have been considered. It is right to say that those who gave evidence on behalf of the plaintiff could not point to an accident caused through a piece breaking off the wire before this accident. One said it might have been so. The answer may well be that they do not all know how their injuries were caused. If it is an abrasion or a cut on the face, they do not know in all cases whether it is due to the flailing of the wire itself of to a piece that breaks off it.

Since the accident to the plaintiff there have been other accidents in this factory. I mentioned one, some little time ago, to Mrs. Callaghan. A piece lodged in her forehead, and she had another piece which hurt her on the leg. Each of those injuries was caused by a piece breaking from the wire. Another witness found a piece in her hair, or a piece went into her hair. Those were after the accident: the defendants are not charged with knowledge of those incidents before the accident. But what I point out is: if those happenings are found when people are watching more carefully afterwards, it does show how easy it is for a piece to come off the broken end or from some part of that broken wire, and it appears that the defendants' general manager thought that was the most likely thing in this case. If consideration had been given as to how the workpeople could be protected against something of that kind, it might well have been said: "Put the guard on, or bring the guard a little lower than it is, "so that the flailing out cannot take place." That, in Mr. Cockerill's view, would have prevented this accident. Mr. Waller, on behalf of the defendants, submitted that whether the defendants were under a duty to take some action to prevent this sort of thing depended in part upon whether there was any reason to anticipate any serious accident. I agree with that; but it was not a very serious matter to extend the guard so as to prevent this sort of thing, if thought had been given to it.

Again, I think that assistance is to be gained, in considering this part of the case, from the words of Warrington L.J. in In re Polemis and Furness Withy & Co. Ltd.[11] which were cited by Pilcher J. in his judgment. Warrington L.J. said: "The result "may be summarised as follows: The presence or absence of "reasonable anticipation of damage determines the legal quality "of the act as negligent or innocent. If it be thus determined to "be negligent, then the question whether particular damages are "recoverable depends only on the answer to the question whether "they are the direct consequence of the act." In the circumstances of this case, there was reason to anticipate damage—damage and injury were caused. So far as we know it was not of a very serious character in the cases to which reference was made; but we do not know all the circumstances. We know that there were a large number of injuries over the years. If there is the cutting of a face through wire or the cutting of a hand through lashing wire or through a part of wire, there must always be a risk of some injury to an eye, whether the workwoman is standing up or stooping down; and that is something which ought to have been anticipated. But even if one could say that no one thought about the possibility or probability of an injury to an eye, it cannot be right, if there are these frequent injuries to the hands and some injuries to the face, that the employers should do nothing year after year.

In my opinion, this is a clear case of failure to take a precaution which, if taken, would result in the workpeople having less risk to undergo. I have not forgotten the evidence given by the defendants' witness that 32 other factories in Sheffield adopted the same method as the defendants and that only one had guards of the kind which the factory inspector recommended. I do not know what their experience was; I have no particulars on which to go: I have only the evidence in this case in regard to the defendants. If it be right to say there have been 600 accidents caused to stranders working in the ropery—most to the hands and legs and body, but some to the face—then I am satisfied that before this accident happened there was a duty upon the defendants to take some steps—proper and necessary steps—to avoid that sort of thing, and if they had done that, this accident would not have happened.

In my judgment, the defendants are responsible in damages for breach of the duty which they owed under the common law. In my view, the appeal should be allowed, and the case should go back for the assessment of damages, unless the parties can agree upon what is a right sum to compensate the plaintiff.

MORRIS L.J. I am of entirely the same opinion; and I only add a few words because we are reaching a conclusion different from that of the learned judge. It seems to me that the employers are responsible on the basis of negligence at common law, but not on the basis of a breach of statutory duty. In his speech in Paris v. Stepney Borough Council [12] Lord Oaksey said that the duty of an employer towards his servant is to take reasonable care for the servant's safety in all the circumstances of the case. The evidence here relating to the circumstances connected with the operation of this machine leads me to a conclusion that there was a failure to exercise reasonable care for the safety of the plaintiff. That failure consisted in not having provided a guard or protection which the defendants knew would have availed to prevent injuries of the kind which they knew were taking place. There clearly could have been some form of protection. Mr. Cockerill said in his evidence more than once that the kind of protection that he contemplated would have availed to prevent the injury which the plaintiff in fact sustained. It does appear that in the case of other similar machines in other factories in Sheffield any guard beyond the upper guard was exceptional. But whatever may have been the position in other factories, the position here, it seems to me, was truly remarkable, and, as I think, quite alarming.

My Lord has referred to the passages in the evidence of Mr. Cockerill, and I do not propose to repeat any citation made by my Lord. I only add one very brief one. Almost at the start of his evidence Mr. Cockerill gave evidence as follows: "(Q.) Let "me deal, first of all, with this point which has just been raised. "It has been said that in the last three years prior to the "accident, 1950 to 1953, there have been 18 eye accidents in "your factory? (A.) I believe it to be true. (Q.) Have you "looked through the records? (A.) I have looked through the "records. (Mr. Drabble): In the ropery, not the factory. (Mr. "Payne): Were those 18 eye accidents in the ropery? (A.) In "the ropery, yes, they were."

My Lord has referred to the evidence showing that there were 600 accidents recorded in the accidents book. There was evidence further that a great many people who had accidents refrained from reporting them. There was the evidence of Mr. Cockerill that some of the reported accidents may have been due to particles of wire breaking off. It seems to me that if there is an end of a wire revolving at over 800 revolutions a minute, and somebody is struck, it may be very difficult for the person to know whether he or she has been struck by an end of the wire or by a particle from the wire. But the source of the danger was the periodical existence of these lashing ends of wire revolving at over 800 revolutions a minute. It seems to me that it was quite immaterial whether an injury was caused by the end of a piece of lashing wire or by an end from a piece of lashing wire. In view of the accident experience of which the defendants had knowledge, as the entries in their books showed, and had knowledge as referred to by Mr. Cockerill in his evidence, it seems to me that they were negligent in failing to prevent injury from those revolving loose wires.

Mr. Waller submitted that there was no evidence of the forseeability of an eye injury, and he submitted that there was no negligence in allowing the lashing or flailing to continue. I cannot take that view. Upon the evidence as to the extent of and the number of the incidents and accidents, I cannot think that they should be regarded as trivial. I think the evidence leads irresistibly to the view that there was a reasonable anticipation of damage. I consider that it was obligatory on the defendants to have taken steps, which they failed to take, which would have prevented the injury that the plaintiff suffered.

I only refer briefly to the other part of the case. It was accepted by Mr. Waller that there was a breach of section 14 in not having some fencing on the lower part of the machine. The cases to which my Lord has referred—Nicholls v. Austin [13] and

C. A.
1956
KILGOLLAN v. WILLIAM COOKE & CO. LTD.
Morris L.J.

Carroll v. Barclay [14]—show the nature of the statutory obligation imposed. The obligation to fence a dangerous machine is satisfied if the dangerous parts are so screened as to prevent the body of the operator coming into contact with them. The evidence in the present case shows that the defendants had it in mind to attach metal sheets so as to screen the lower part of the machine. Had they done so at a date before that on which the plaintiff was injured, then the injury to the plaintiff would not in fact have occurred: that is clear from the evidence of Mr. Cockerill. But it seems to me that the defendants were not obliged, so far as their statutory obligation was concerned, to use metal sheets. They might have adopted some other form of fencing, and it may be that they could have satisfied their statutory obligation in such a way as would not have prevented the escape of some flying particle of wire. I doubt, therefore, whether it is shown that the plaintiff's injury resulted from a breach of the defendants' obligation under section 14. But furthermore, it can in this case be postulated that section 14 is not designed to protect against the ejection from a machine of material or articles which have been introduced into the machine. That being so, an injury caused by such an ejection is not an injury against which the legislation was designed to protect.

My Lord has referred to Grant v. National Coal Board [15] and has quoted some of the observations made in the speeches in that case. Lord Reid said [16] this: "If the statute is only aimed "at preventing a certain kind of injury, then it seems reasonable "to hold (as in Gorris v. Scott) that civil liability only results if "that kind of injury is caused by a breach." Lord Keith in his speech said [17]: "Reference was made to the case of Gorris "v. Scott.[18] This case might be in point if it could be "postulated that section 49 was confined to protecting workmen "from injury through being hit by falling material." Applying that passage, and other passages cited, Mr. Waller submits that it can in the present case be postulated—because it has been so laid down—that the object of section 14 is to prevent workmen coming into contact with the machine but not to prevent them coming into contact with materials which are being worked on in a machine.

Lord Somervell of Harrow said in his speech that he could not agree that the mischief of derailment by a fall from an insecure roof was not within the ambit of the section. That was section 49 of the Coal Mines Act, 1911. Mr. Waller submits in the present case that the "ambit of the section" was to protect a workman from contact with the machine and not to protect a workman against injury caused by the ejection of some material from a machine, and, accordingly, that injury so caused does not form the basis of civil liability for a breach of the section.

I think that Mr. Waller's submissions on those points are correct. But, for the reasons that I have earlier given, it seems to me that there was clearly, in this case, negligence at common law for which the defendants should be held liable.

ROMER L.J. I also think that there was evidence of negligence at common law and that the appeal should be allowed on that ground. I can express my reasons for that view in a sentence or two. It appears to me that if the judge had accepted (as I venture to think he ought to have accepted) a certain hypothesis, he would have arrived at the same conclusion on this point as we have reached. He said in the course of his judgment, "If the defendants fell below the standard of guard required "from an employer in failing to take steps to protect their "employees from injuries by flailing wire—and this they could "have done by guarding the machine, by putting on what I have "described as the lower guard—then it seems to me that they "cannot escape liability for a serious injury such as the plaintiff's, which they could not foresee, if such an injury would "not have occurred but for their want of care in guarding against "trivial injuries which they knew did occur." He refused to accept the hypothesis which appears at the beginning of that statement, on the ground that the injuries to these workpeople from the flailing wires were trivial; and it is on that point that I find myself at variance with the learned judge.

For the reasons which my brethren have stated and which I do not repeat, it is not really possible, I think, to treat these injuries—amounting, as they appear in the accidents book alone, to over 600—as trivial, having regard not only to the number of the injuries but to their nature, and bearing in mind the fact that some of them occurred to the faces of the girls. Accordingly, I think that the learned judge ought to have accepted the hypothesis which he rejected, and, if so, the liability of the defendants follows, upon the principle stated by Warrington L.J. in the Polemis case [19] and adopted and elaborated by Asquith L.J. in the subsequent case of Thurogood v. Van den Berghs.[20]

On the question of statutory liability, I would merely say that it is unnecessary to express a concluded view upon it. But, as at present advised, it appears to me, having regard to the principles stated by the House of Lords in Nicholls's case,[21] combined with the principles stated by their Lordships in Grant's case,[22] that

There is power in the court in a proper case to allow interrogatories as to the contents of a document which has been lost or destroyed if secondary evidence of that document would be admissible at the trial or hearing.

Wolverhampton New Waterworks v. Hawkesford (1859) 5 C.B. (N.S.) 703 applied.

But where, in a defended divorce suit on the ground of desertion, the case of the wife petitioner was one of simple desertion, and the husband by his answer, in which he sought no relief, alleged that he had been driven out and had had just cause for leaving, and referred to a finding by justices against the wife of adultery, and it was ordered by the registrar that the husband should answer interrogatories as to the dates when he had received certain letters from the wife which he had stated in a list of documents to have been burnt, as to the number of those letters, and as to their contents:—

Held, on appeal, that such interrogatories should not in the circumstances be allowed, for

(1) On the pleadings, the interrogatories and the matters that might there be elicited were not necessary for the wife to establish her case of simple desertion (although the letters might be relevant in a general sense).

(2) The interrogatories were not "necessary either for disposing "fairly of the case or for saving costs"—within the meaning of R.S.C., Ord. 31, r. 2.

Per curiam. When a summons is adjourned into court for judgment it is always open to counsel on either side to make any further submission which he may wish to make.

SUMMONS (adjourned into court).

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment: The wife by her petition alleged that the husband deserted her in January, 1947, the parties having been married in June, 1946. There was one child of the marriage, a daughter born in June, 1947; and on June 15, 1952, the wife gave birth to a child of which the husband was not the father. The wife in her petition asked for the exercise of the court's discretion in her favour and filed a discretion statement. There had been various proceedings between the parties before the justices. On January 18, 1947, the wife obtained an order on the ground of her husband's desertion, and after certain variations as to amount the order was revoked on the husband's application on August 8, 1952, on the ground that the wife had committed adultery. On that same day the wife obtained an order for the custody of the child of the marriage. On September 3, 1953, the order with regard to the custody of the child was varied and the husband was given the custody of the child.

The issue in the suit was one of simple desertion. The wife alleged that the husband had left her in 1947 without cause. The husband alleged that she had driven him out, and, alternatively, that he had had just cause for leaving her. He stated in his answer that the justices' order had been discharged on the ground of the wife's adultery, but he merely asked that the prayer in the petition be rejected. There was, therefore, no issue of adultery in the suit; the sole issue was desertion.

It was agreed between the respective solicitors that lists of documents should be supplied by each side, and the form which the husband's solicitors used for the husband's list of documents was the printed form which is frequently used for affidavits of documents. The question before the court arose under paragraph 4 of that list of documents. The affidavit form (though it was not sworn, the words "make oath" being struck out) which was signed by the husband stated at paragraph 3: "I have had, "but have not now, in my possession or power the documents "relating to the matters in question in this suit set forth in the "second schedule hereto." Emphasis was placed in argument on behalf of the husband on the words "relating to." The second schedule referred to "letters petitioner to respondent, "dates unknown. Letters respondent to petitioner. Dates "unknown." The important part was "letters petitioner to "respondent. Dates unknown." Paragraph 4 read: "The last-"mentioned documents were last in my possession or power, as "to (a) the letters sent by me, on the date of posting of the "same, and as to (b) the letters received by me, shortly after "the date of receipt of the same when I burned them."

It was on the statement that the husband had had, but no longer had, in his possession or power letters from his wife to him, which he had burned shortly after the receipt, that the present application and consequent order for interrogatories were made. The interrogatories, as initialled by Mr. Registrar Kinsley, were as follows: "(1) When did you receive from the [wife] the

RAMSEY v. RAMSEY.

"letters set forth in the second schedule on your list of documents, stating to the best of your ability the approximate date of each such letter? (2) How many such letters did you receive? (3) To the best of your recollection, what were the contents of each such letter?" The husband appealed.

The main objection on behalf of the husband on his appeal was to the third interrogatory.

James Fox Andrews and B. R. O. Carter for the husband.
Dimitri Tolstoy for the wife.

Argument was for the most part in chambers, as indicated in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

DAVIES J. stated the facts substantially as set out above and continued: This appeal came before me first in chambers on December 20, 1955, when, at the request of both counsel, having had the benefit of a very full argument, I adjourned the summons into open court with a view to giving judgment. Later, a message was conveyed to me that before I gave judgment Mr. Tolstoy, for the wife, wanted to mention one further point. Rightly or wrongly, even without any such message, I take the view that when a summons is adjourned into open court it is always open to counsel on either side to make any further submission which he may wish to make.

Counsel for the husband does not object very strongly to interrogatories nos. 1 and 2, but he does object to interrogatory no. 3, that is to say, he objects to having to answer what were the contents of these various letters. Speaking for myself, I take the view that really they stand or fall together. If interrogatory no. 3 should not be answered, then I cannot see any reason for allowing nos. 1 and 2; if, on the other hand, interrogatory no. 3 is a proper interrogatory, then I can see no objection to interrogatories nos. 1 and 2.

The two points made on behalf of the appellant husband are these. First, he says that it is not proper to interrogate as to the contents of written documents, and, secondly, he says that, even assuming that in a proper case the court can make an order for such interrogatories, in the circumstances of this case it would be wrong to allow these interrogatories, particularly no. 3. He says that for two reasons, if I understand aright: first, that despite the fact that they are included in his client's list of documents as being relevant documents, there is no issue in this suit as to the correspondence; secondly, he says, referring to the words of R.S.C., Ord. 31, r. 2,[1] that the interrogatories in general,

[1] R.S.C., Ord. 31, r. 2: "A copy of the interrogatories proposed to be delivered shall be delivered with the summons or notice of application for leave to deliver them at least two days before the hearing thereof . . . and the particular interrogatories sought to be delivered shall be suband no. 3 in particular, are not "necessary either for disposing "fairly of the cause or matter or for saving costs."

On the first point I am quite satisfied on an authority that has been cited to me that there is power in the court in a proper case to allow interrogatories as to the contents of a non-existent document. When I say "non-existent" I mean in the sense of lost or destroyed. Two cases were cited to me on this point. The first one, Herschfeld v. Clarke,[2] does not, I think, advance the matter very much further; but the second one, Wolverhampton New Waterworks v. Hawksford,[3] is obviously of great importance. It is not necessary, I think, for me to consider that case in detail. Suffice it to say that I am quite satisfied that the court in that case was saying that an interrogatory may only be administered as to the contents of a written document if secondary evidence of that document would be admissible at the trial or hearing. In that particular case, documents had never reached the possession of the party seeking to administer interrogatories, so that that party would not have any personal knowledge of their contents. Therefore, if it is shown that a document is lost or destroyed, a party who has knowledge of its contents may be interrogated about its contents if he could have been asked the same question in court. If, on the other hand, there is no evidence that the document is lost or destroyed, then, just as secondary evidence of its contents would not be admissible in court, interrogatories are not permissible. As a corollary to that, the proper way to obtain evidence of the contents would seem to be (a) if the document is in the possession of the other party, by discovery in the ordinary way on affidavit of documents and notice to inspect, and (b) if it is in the possession of a third party, by taking the ordinary steps to obtain production by subpoena duces tecum or otherwise. In Wolverhampton New Waterworks v. Hawksford[3] it was made perfectly plain with regard to the documents which were no longer in existence that interrogatories should be allowed. I need quote only one sentence from the judgment of Williams J.[4]: "With respect to the sixth and seventh,"—that is to say, of the interrogatories—"I do not see why the benefit of the act should "not be extended to a case of this sort, when satisfactory "evidence is given of the loss of the instrument the contents of "which are sought to be proved by secondary evidence."

I am satisfied, therefore, that in a proper case such an order can be made. But the question is whether it ought to be made

"mitted to and considered by the "court or judge. In deciding upon "such application, the court or judge "shall take into acount any offer, "which may be made by the party "sought to be interrogated to deliver "particulars, or to make admissions, "or to produce documents relating to "any matter in question, and leave "shall be given as to such only of the "interrogatories as shall be considered "necessary either for disposing fairly "of the cause or matter or for saving "costs."

RAMSEY v. RAMSEY.

in the present case. As I have already indicated, there is on the pleadings no issue as to correspondence at all. Obviously, as was pointed out by Mr. Tolstoy, in any case between a husband and wife where desertion is alleged on one side or the other, correspondence leading up to, or, as in this case, correspondence subsequent to the separation may be most material or most relevant as a part of the whole story. There are many cases in which there is in the pleadings a reference to letters: for example, where the petitioner alleging desertion pleads that after the respondent had left the petitioner wrote a number of letters asking for a resumption of cohabitation and that those letters, or those parts of those letters, were ignored by the respondent, or the offers made in them were rejected. This is not one of such cases; and although the letters may be relevant in a general sense, I cannot say that any issue arises with regard to this correspondence at all. My attention was called to the well-known passage in the judgment of A. L. Smith L.J. in Kennedy v. Dodson,[5] though, as was emphasized by Mr. Tolstoy this morning, the facts of that case were, of course, far removed from those of the present case. The passage relied on for the appellant was at the opening part of the judgment[6]: "In my opinion, the "legitimate use, and the only legitimate use, of interrogatories "is to obtain from the party interrogated admissions of facts "which it is necessary for the party interrogating to prove in "order to establish his case; and if the party interrogating goes "further, and seeks by his interrogatories to get from the other "party matters which it is not incumbent on him to prove, "although such matters may indirectly assist his case, the "interrogatories ought not to be admitted."

On the pleadings as they are before me in this suit, are these interrogatories as to how many letters the wife wrote to the husband, when he got them, and what was in them, and the matters that might there be elicited, necessary for her to establish her case? In my opinion they are not. As I said, the case is one of simple desertion, and I cannot say that it is necessary for her to prove these letters in establishing her case.

There is another point, which is in fact part of the second point under R.S.C., Ord. 31, r. 2. Are these interrogatories necessary either for disposing fairly of the case or for saving costs? If the wife wrote a number of letters to her husband, as no doubt she did, she knows what she wrote in them; if she wants to prove the contents of those letters she can say in the witness box what was in them. It is perfectly true that it would be very handy for her by means of these interrogatories to force the husband, who is not asking for cross-relief, to set out affirmatively what he says was in the letters. But supposing the husband is minded to give inaccurate answers about the contents of the letters (I use the word "inaccurate" advisedly).

is he less likely to give inaccurate answers to this interrogatory than he would on oath in the witness box? What sort of benefit is the wife likely to derive from these interrogatories and what saving of costs is likely to ensue if I allow them? I put the question in that way and the answer seems to be plain: none.

In those circumstances, though there is, in my judgment, plainly the power to allow these interrogatories, I fail to see that they are necessary within the meaning of R.S.C., Ord. 31, r. 2. In my judgment, therefore this appeal succeeds. The appeal will be allowed and the order of the registrar discharged.

Appeal allowed.

solicitor should employ the clerk without the written permission of the society. The committee, after holding an inquiry, made the order in those terms. The clerk appealed on the ground that since the allegations against his principal had failed there was no act or default to which he could be a party and that, therefore, the committee could make no order against him:—

Held, that section 16 (1) (b) of the Act of 1941 did not require that the solicitor should be found guilty of acts or defaults before his clerk can be dealt with by the disciplinary committee and that in all the circumstances it was right that the order should be upheld.

APPEAL from an order of the disciplinary committee.

On April 26, 1955, a complaint was preferred on behalf of the Law Society against a solicitor alleging that he had been guilty of professional misconduct in that he had (a) caused or permitted to be filed in the High Court of Justice an affidavit which he knew or ought to have known was false or, alternatively, misleading in a material respect, and (b) failed adequately to supervise his clerk. An inquiry was duly held by the disciplinary committee of the society. The committee found that a false and misleading affidavit had been filed and used in a proceeding in which the solicitor was acting for the party on whose behalf the affidavit was prepared and filed but that the solicitor did not know and in fact could not have known of the contents of the affidavit. Nevertheless, they considered he was not altogether blameless in that he should have exercised special care in the particular case because there was a possibility of a conflict of interest between the client and the solicitor's clerk. The clerk had had certain financial dealings with the client and as managing clerk to the solicitor he was undertaking the conduct of the proceedings. The affidavit had been prepared and filed by the clerk, the solicitor being absent from his office.

In the course of the inquiry before the committee facts appeared, relative to the preparation of the affidavit, which in the opinion of the Professional Conduct Committee (a body acting on behalf of the Law Society) justified an application to the disciplinary committee for an order under section 16 (1) of the Solicitors Act, 1941, that no solicitor should employ the clerk without the written permission of the society. The disciplinary committee held an inquiry at which the clerk was represented and on January 27, 1956, made an order in those terms.

The clerk appealed against the order on the ground that since the disciplinary committee had already found the allegations against his principal not to have been substantiated, there had been no act or default within the meaning of section 16 (1) (b) of the Act of 1941, on the part of his principal to which he could have been a party and accordingly the committee could not make an order in respect of him.

A SOLICITOR'S CLERK, In re.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 24. LORD GODDARD C.J. read the following judgment of the court, in which he stated the facts and continued: At the close of the argument we announced that the appeal was dismissed, but as we believe this to be the first case in which an order against an unadmitted clerk under section 16 of the Act of 1941 has come before this court on appeal, and as we are upholding the order on somewhat different grounds to those given by the committee in their report, we thought it desirable that we should put the reasons for our judgment in writing.

[His Lordship read section 16 (1) (b) of the Act of 1941, and continued:] The main and, indeed, the whole objection which was made on the part of the appellant was that as the committee had found the complaints against the solicitor to have failed, no order could be made against the clerk in that he could not be a party to an act or default of a solicitor in respect of which an application or complaint had been made if the committee found the case not proved against the solicitor.

In order to invoke these proceedings it must first appear to the society that a clerk, who is not himself a solicitor, has been a party to an act or default of a solicitor, and that such act or default is one in respect of which an application or complaint could be made against the solicitor. That no doubt means that there must be reasonable grounds for the society to take action under the section. As it was admitted that the affidavit was, at least, misleading and that the clerk took part in its preparation and filed it, it was obvious that there were reasonable grounds for the society taking action and indeed the committee found that there was a prima facie case calling for an answer so we need not deal further with this point. Then it must be remembered that an application or complaint to the disciplinary committee by a person who is alleging an act or default must be made against a solicitor. It is only the society who can complain of the conduct of a clerk and the conduct of which the society can complain must appear in the course or as a result of proceedings before the committee against a solicitor. Accordingly, we have to see whether there was a complaint with regard to an act or default on the part of the solicitor. The act complained of was the preparation and filing of this affidavit and that must be regarded as the act of the solicitor who was the solicitor on the record.

It is not disputed that for any consequences which might result and cause damage to any person the solicitor would be responsible, for he was the solicitor on the record and it matters not whether he prepared and filed the affidavit personally or by the hand of his clerk. The committee find, and it is not disputed, that the clerk was a party to the preparation and filing, and, indeed, he was the actual person who prepared and filed the affidavit and he knew that it was misleading. The solicitor escaped punishment because he neither knew nor was in a position to know the misleading character of the affidavit and therefore it would not be right to make him, what may be called for this purpose, criminally liable for what was done. But the section does not require that the solicitor himself should be found guilty or punished before the clerk can be dealt with by the committee. He has been a party to the act. Had the solicitor known of the misleading character of the affidavit he would have been dealt with by the committee and it is not disputed that in such a case the clerk could also be dealt with by them. It would be a strange result if because the solicitor shows that he had no knowledge of what his clerk did that the clerk could escape the consequences of his misconduct. It would mean that a clerk who was able to conceal his misconduct from his master could escape any punishment by the disciplinary committee. As soon as it is discovered that a false affidavit has been filed in an action or proceeding it is clear that an application can be made against the solicitor who is responsible as the solicitor on the record for the filing of the affidavit. He may be able, as in this case, to show for whatever reason that he did not know that the affidavit was false. The clerk was clearly a party to the act for which the solicitor would have to accept civil liability if any resulted. In our opinion, therefore, there is no doubt that the society, who had learned of the clerk's action in the course of the inquiry against the solicitor, could take the proceedings authorized by the section.

It appears from their report that the committee considered that as they had found that the solicitor could not be held blameless, that was an act or default on his part to which the clerk was a party. We understand by that that the committee found that the clerk was a party to the offence alleged against the solicitor, that he failed adequately to supervise his clerk, but we find it difficult to see how the clerk can be a party to the failure of his principal to exercise proper supervision over him. Failure by a principal to exercise supervision over a clerk is a failure on the part of the principal only, and the solicitor was acquitted of that charge. The result of the failure was that the clerk was able to do certain acts without the knowledge of his employer. That is the offence for which, in our opinion, the clerk was liable to be dealt with by the disciplinary committee. Accordingly, we uphold the order of the committee though it may be on different grounds to those which we understand the committee gave, but it is quite clear that the committee found that the appellant caused an affidavit to be filed which he knew was false or misleading. We therefore uphold the order of the committee and dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Negligence—Common employment—Joint negligence—Gang of workmen jointly negligent in unloading cargo—Member of gang injured—Whether duty owed to injured workman by fellow workmen—Liability of employer.

The plaintiff, who was a member of a gang of six workmen employed by a firm of master stevedores, sustained injuries when a number of bags of sodium carbonate, which formed the cargo of a barge being unloaded by the gang, fell upon him. The collapse of the bags was due to their instability arising from the method of unstowing adopted by the gang contrary to the express and repeated instructions of the hatch foreman in charge and others. The plaintiff, who was of equal status with his fellow workmen in the gang, was himself expressly instructed to deal with the cause of the instability of the bags and warned of the danger they presented; but he ignored the instructions and he and the other members of the gang continued, in the absence of the hatch foreman, to unstow the cargo by their own method instead of in the manner in which they were instructed:—

Held, (1) that there was a duty owed to the plaintiff by each member of the gang to take reasonable care in the actual work of unstowing and in the method of work employed, and accordingly, even though the plaintiff tacitly consented to the method of unstowing contrary to instructions, the employers were liable vicariously for the negligence of his fellow workmen.

Per curiam. If a number of men engage in an occupation which is contrary to instructions, and also which is dangerous, there nevertheless is a duty owed by one to the other to use reasonable care, and that duty is not abrogated by joining together and carrying out a common operation. Even the assent to carrying out that operation might in certain circumstances amount to a breach of duty to a man who is also carrying it out; it is a breach of duty that one man owed to the other.

ACTION.

The plaintiff, John Williams, was on March 21, 1954, a member of a gang of six workmen of equal status employed by the first defendants, Liverpool Stevedoring Co. Ltd., in unloading bags of sodium carbonate from the barge Oswald, owned by the second defendants, Imperial Chemical Industries Ltd., which was lying alongside the steamship Sarmiento in the North No. 1 Canada Dock, Liverpool.

The normal method of unloading a cargo such as that carried by the barge Oswald was to make a " sink " in the cargo, i.e., to remove a number of bags from a part of the hold down to a depth of about half-a-dozen bags, and then to " level off " by discharging all the bags in the hold to the level of the " sink." That method of unloading ensured that there was never a dangerously high tier of bags and the cargo could be discharged with safety. When the gang commenced unloading, a sink had already been made in the cargo and the hatch foreman, who was also employed by the first defendants, told the gang to clear off the upper layers of bags in the hold until they reached the level of the sink. The hatch foreman waited a short while to see that his order was carried out; but when he went away to attend to other duties the gang apparently decided to continue unloading in their own way and made a further sink before clearing the bags in the first sink, so that at one part of the hold of the barge there was left a stack of bags some 12 bags high. The members of the gang were working in pairs on different sides of the hold and the plaintiff and his mate were working about mid-ship on that line of bags. When the hatch foreman returned and saw that the gang were not complying with his order he instructed them to level off the top bags so as to reduce the risk, and told them that there might be trouble if they did not; but when he went away the gang again reverted to their own method of unloading. During a break in work at mid-day the hatch foreman told the plaintiff to take the bags off the top as they were getting dangerous, and the plaintiff promised to do so. In fact he did not do so, but resumed working as before. The master, the mate and the engineer of the barge also told the gang that they ought to take the bags off the top but their warnings went unheeded.

[1] Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, s. 1: " (1) Where " any person suffers damage as the " result partly of his own fault and " partly of the fault of any other " person or persons, a claim in respect " of that damage shall not be defeated " by reason of the fault of the person " suffering the damage, but the " damages recoverable in respect " thereof shall be reduced to such ex- " tent as the court thinks just and " equitable having regard to the " claimant's share in the responsibi- " lity for the damage: "

As a result of the method of unstowing adopted by the gang there was left in the hold three tiers of bags, 12 bags high, and while the plaintiff was making a sling a pile of bags collapsed and injured the plaintiff.

The plaintiff brought this action claiming damages on the ground, inter alia, of negligence by the first and second defendants. The claim as originally pleaded was based almost entirely upon allegations of bad stowage, but Lynskey J. found that the cargo was properly stowed and that the accident would not have happened if the proper method of unstowing had been adopted. His Lordship held that the claim against both defendants would have failed had it rested as originally pleaded and as the case was opened, but gave leave for the statement of claim to be amended. By his amendment the plaintiff pleaded alternatively against the first defendants (1) an unsafe method of unstowing by their servants or agents (other than the plaintiff), and (2) the failure of the first defendants' servants or agents (other than the plaintiff) to observe the order of the hatch foreman and the warnings of the barge officers.

By their amended defence the first defendants in effect put in issue the question whether the members of the gang (other than the plaintiff) were in breach of any duty to him and alleged that the plaintiff voluntarily undertook the unstowing of the bags with full knowledge of the risks involved.

H. I. Nelson Q.C. and J. M. Davies for the first defendants.
Gordon Clover for the second defendants.

The following case, in addition to those referred to in the judgment, was cited in argument: Baker v. Market Harborough Industrial Co-operative Society Ltd.[2]

LYNSKEY J., after stating the facts substantially summarized above, said: In any event I am bound to find for the Imperial Chemical Industries Ltd., because the only allegation against them is bad stowage. The plaintiff has failed to establish that, and there will be judgment for the second defendants. With regard to the employers, in his final speech, counsel for the plaintiff said that even although one did not accept the evidence for the plaintiff, nevertheless he was still entitled to ask for partial damages at least, because the employers would be vicariously liable for the negligence of the other five men who, with the plaintiff, were engaged in the general operation of unstowing.

Counsel for the plaintiff applied to me for leave to amend his pleadings in order to raise that case, which was, of course, an abandonment of his own case, and the setting up of a new case

WILLIAMS v. PORT OF LIVERPOOL STEVEDORING CO. LTD.

based on the defendants' own evidence. Counsel for the first defendants resisted the application, but I felt it right to grant it, because it seemed to me that it was the duty of the court to do justice as far as it could, and not to allow defects in pleading to prevent justice being done; and I reserved the question of costs, and gave leave to amend. The plaintiff has now amended his pleadings by pleading: "(v) Alternatively, their servants or "agents (other than the plaintiff) unstowed the said bags vertic- "ally downwards from only part of the forward section of the "hold of the barge instead of removing the said bags uniformly "by sinking and levelling off over the whole area of the said "section and thereby left a wall of bags which were liable to fall; "further or alternatively—(vi) Their servants or agents (other "than the plaintiff) failed to pay regard to or observe the order "of their hatch foreman to work the top bags off the tiers and/or "failed to heed the warnings of the master, the mate, and the "engineer of the said barge that the tiers of bags were "dangerously high and might fall and the suggestions of the said "officers that such servants or agents ought to step or level "off the said tiers."

In other words, for the purpose of their alternative claim the plaintiff is adopting the defendants' case and accepting it as being accurate; and on that contends that he is entitled to make the employers pay at least partial compensation. In further and better particulars the plaintiff sets out the names of the five witnesses who appeared in this case. The result is that the plaintiff now claims that his evidence, and that of all his witnesses, must be disregarded. It is a curious position at which to arrive, but there it is.

The first defendants' reply, so far as is material, reads: "They [the first defendants] admit and affirm that their servants "or agents including the plaintiff unstowed the said bags vertic- "ally downwards . . . instead of removing the said bags "uniformly by sinking and levelling off over the whole area . . . "and they further allege that the plaintiff acted in concert and "together with his said fellow servants, and that he and "they together were in breach of their contract of employment "and/or duty to the first defendants their employers, but of no "other duty. . . . That the plaintiff tacitly agreed with their "said servants or agents . . . to ignore and disobey the orders, "warnings, and suggestions, and to unstow the said bags in a "dangerous manner as aforesaid, and by reason of such conduct "and tacit agreement none of the said servants or agents owed "any duty to the plaintiff with regard to the said method of "unstowing. Further and/or in the alternative by his conduct "and tacit agreement as aforesaid, and with a full knowledge and "appreciation of the risks involved, the plaintiff voluntarily "undertook to unstow the said bags in the said manner with the "said servants or agents."

In other words, the first defendants are saying in that reply that the individual servants themselves had no duty to the plaintiff to take care and, as they had no duty to the plaintiff to take care, therefore, the employer cannot be vicariously liable. Alternatively, they are saying in effect, that even if that is not right, the plaintiff, by joining in this dangerous system of work, was tacitly consenting to accept the risks of such work, and in those circumstances the doctrine of volenti non fit injuria applies.

There is authority of the House of Lords in Stapley v. Gypsum Mines Ltd.,[1] where very similar circumstances arose. That was a case where two miners of equal status were employed in the respondents' gypsum mine. They were directed by the foreman of the respondents to bring down the roof of a stope in which they were proposing to work, as it was unsafe and likely to fall. After attempting unsuccessfully to bring it down, they jointly agreed to cease their efforts and to carry on with their normal work. Shortly after resuming work one of the miners was killed by a fall of part of the roof. The House of Lords, by a majority, held that the employer was liable, because the accident was partly caused or contributed to by the workman who was not killed, and although the deceased man himself was guilty of negligence in carrying on despite the foreman's order, nevertheless the employer was still liable for the negligence of the fellow employee who had joined with him in carrying out some scheme to disobey the orders of the foreman.

It was said by counsel for the first defendants that the duty which one servant owed to another was not argued in that case; and that if it had been argued, it would have been open to the court to come to the conclusion that where a number of men jointly engage in doing an act which is a negligent and dangerous act, no duty is owed each to the other; and therefore, that if no duty is owed, there cannot be any negligence. It may sound an attractive argument, but I think I am bound by the authority of the Gypsum case.[1] In a case to which I have been referred by counsel for the plaintiff, Laszczyk v. National Coal Board,[2] that question was again not argued; but it was said in that case also, that there was a duty owed by one employee to another, and in my view it must be so. It certainly is so in the ordinary case of individual negligence hurting another man, even though that is in disobedience of orders, as long as it is in the course of his employment. It seems to me that if a number of men engage in an occupation which is contrary to instructions, and which is also dangerous, there nevertheless is a duty owed by one to the other to use reasonable care, and that duty is not abrogated by joining together and carrying out a common operation. Even the assent to carrying out that operation might in certain circumstances amount to a breach of duty to a man who is also carrying it out; it is a breach of duty that one man owed to the other.

Having regard to Stapley v. Gypsum Mines Ltd.,[3] I am bound to hold that there was a duty owed by each of the gang of six to each other to take reasonable care in the actual work of unstowing and in the method of work employed. In my view in the present case, although the plaintiff gave tacit consent to the operation of unstowing in this way, contrary to orders given to himself personally at one time, nevertheless he is entitled to hold his employer liable vicariously for the negligence of his fellow workmen; the only test that one can apply being not whether it was contrary to orders, but whether it was work done in the course of his employment. The result is, in my view, that the plaintiff is entitled to compensation for the damage he has sustained in an accident, which I hold was due to the negligence both of his fellow workmen and himself, and there is contributory negligence as far as he is concerned. [His Lordship assessed damages, on the basis that the plaintiff was not guilty of negligence, at £1,947 6s. 9d., and continued:]

That brings me to the final question: as the employer was vicariously liable for the negligence of the other members of the gang, and as the plaintiff is also guilty of negligence, in what proportion ought I to allocate responsibility for the damage? It is not by any means an easy question to decide. I was tempted at one time to say that, as the employer had taken every step he could to try to avoid this accident, I ought to increase the plaintiff's responsibility in relation to the vicarious liability, but I am afraid that the words of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, prevent me from doing that, much as I would like to do; but I mention it so that it can be taken up elsewhere, if it is thought worth while taking up. The Act provides that in proceedings against any person for contribution, the amount of contribution recovered should be such as may be found by the court to be just and equitable having regard to that person's responsibility for the damage; and gives power to exempt from liability or award complete indemnity. That means that this court has to have regard to what is just and equitable in deciding that contribution, and regard has to be had to that person's responsibility for the damage.

I have to consider the responsibility of the plaintiff and the other members of the gang, but in doing so I am helped by the observations of Lord Reid in the Gypsum case.[4] He said[5]: "Normally one would not disturb such an award, but Sellers J. "does not appear to have taken into account the fact that "Stapley deliberately and culpably entered the stope. By doing "so it appears to me that he contributed to the accident much

[5] Ibid. 682

" more directly than Dale. The Act directs that the damages " ' shall be reduced to such extent as the court thinks just and " ' equitable, having regard to the claimant's share in the " ' responsibility for the damage ' (section 1 (1)). A court must " deal broadly with the problem of apportionment and in con- " sidering what is just and equitable must have regard to the " blameworthiness of each party, but ' the claimant's share in " ' the responsibility for the damage ' cannot, I think, be assessed " without considering the relative importance of his acts in " causing the damage, apart from his blameworthiness."

In other words, one is directed to take more or less a jury view of responsibility in these cases, taking into account: first, the causation of the damage, secondly, blameworthiness, and thirdly, trying to do what is just and equitable. The view I take in this case is not that put forward by counsel for the plaintiff. He says that where there is a gang of six working together and they all tacitly agree to ignore instructions or indulge in a system of work which is dangerous, then they are all equally to blame, and the plaintiff is entitled to recover five-sixths of the damages. It does not seem to me that this is a mathematical problem, but one of doing what is equitable, having regard to the responsibility and culpability.

The view I take is that the employers are liable here, not for the individual acts of each individual person employed in the work, but for a dangerous method of work which was tacitly adopted by those six men. That was the real cause of this accident, and the employers are not liable for the individual acts of these men in carrying out the unstowing, but for the acts of the men as a gang, and as a group, tacitly agreeing to adopt a system of work which was contrary to the order of the hatch foreman, and was dangerous. Looking at it from that point of view, it seems to me that the plaintiff, although he was only of equal status with his fellow workers in the gang, could, if he had liked, have seen that the foreman's method of work was carried out; and his tacit assent was essential to the carrying out of the work in the way it was done. That seems to me to be the fair inference to draw from the evidence of the hatch foreman, who told me that at 11 o'clock he actually spoke to the plaintiff himself, and told him to take the top bags off; and the plaintiff replied: " All right, Jim; I will do that." It seems to me that the effect of that was that the plaintiff himself was saying: " Right you are, Jim; I will see that that is done "; and if he had not been an assenting party to this method, it could have been stopped. I think that the plaintiff was equally responsible with the other five men in the gang in carrying out this wrong method of work, because it required the consent of all the gang to carry it out, and the plaintiff could have stopped it if he had wanted. In my view, the proportion of responsibility is "fifty-"fifty," and I reduce the amount the plaintiff is to recover by one half.

Where bankruptcy proceedings are being conducted in a county court, there is no jurisdiction under section 100 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, to order that a motion in the bankruptcy be transferred from the county court having conduct of the proceedings to the High Court apart from the rest of the bankruptcy proceedings. The reference in section 100 (2) to the transfer of "any pro-"ceedings" from one court to another is a reference to the whole proceedings which initiated the bankruptcy.

In re Marquis of Huntly [1917] 2 K.B. 729 considered.

MOTION.

By an order of the Manchester County Court dated August 10, 1954, one Haroutune Kouyoumdjian was adjudicated bankrupt. By a motion dated December 14, 1955, his trustee asked for a declaration that a payment of £3,000 on May 21, 1954, to the respondent, Cyril Lord, or alternatively to the respondent company, Brindles Ltd., through their agent Cyril Lord, was fraudulent and void as against the trustee under section 1 (1) (b) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914; alternatively that it was fraudulent and void under section 172 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, or void under section 42 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914.

By a motion dated April 11, 1956, the trustee applied to the judge sitting in bankruptcy for an order transferring the first motion to the High Court. The grounds of the application were that it would be more convenient if the motion were heard in London, as a number of witnesses required for cross-examination were resident in London, and that the matter being of some complication was expected to last more than one day. The respondents did not oppose the application.

The case cited in argument is referred to in the judgment.

UPJOHN J., having stated the facts, continued: Before I consider the merits of the application I have to consider whether there is jurisdiction under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, to transfer such a motion to this court while the general administration of the bankrupt's affairs remains in the county court in Manchester, the court in which the order of adjudication was originally made. The application is made under section 100 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914.[1] [His Lordship read sections 100 and 122 of the Act and rules 21, 26 and 27 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1952, and continued:] I understand that an application was made informally to the registrar of the Manchester County Court asking him to request the High Court to deal with this motion pursuant to section 122, but that he felt himself bound, and in my opinion rightly, by the decision of the Divisional Court in In re Marquis of Huntly [2] to indicate that he could not make the order.

Before I consider the actual words of the section, my approach to its construction is this: it is clear from the rules that I have read that at all events the draftsman of the rules thought that a transfer of proceedings under section 100 would be a transfer of all the proceedings and not merely of some motion or other application pending in the bankruptcy proceedings. Again, it seems to me that section 122 is directed to asking the assistance of courts other than that in which the bankruptcy is proceeding to assist in particular matters such as this; but there is no doubt that the ambit of that section has certainly had a judicial gloss put upon it in the Huntly case [2] which renders its ambit somewhat circumscribed in extent.

Reliance, however, is placed upon that case, for Horridge J., in the course of his judgment, said this [3]: "By section 100 of "the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, the matter might have been trans- "ferred to London if there was ground for the exercise of the "power of transfer. The legislature has invested the county "courts to whom bankruptcy jurisdiction is assigned with the "same powers as I have." It is said that Horridge J. thought that the particular application in that case could by itself have been transferred. I do not regard that authority, however, as being of assistance to me, because I do not know whether Horridge J., in referring to "the matter," referred to the whole of the bankruptcy proceedings or merely the application pending before him, and, of course, the question of the precise jurisdiction under section 100 was not in issue before that court.

There is one other matter which must affect the approach to section 100, and that is subsection (3). If there is jurisdiction to transfer any motion or other application under subsection (2), it would hardly seem necessary to have inserted subsection (3). It would seem more convenient that the motion should be determined from start to finish by the High Court to which it would be transferred.

Those matters, however, only indicate the approach that I adopt to section 100 (2). The precise jurisdiction conferred on the court must depend on the exact words used in the section. It starts in the widest possible way. "Any proceedings in bank- "ruptcy" are certainly wide words, and the question is whether those words are sufficiently wide, notwithstanding other matters that I have indicated and, in particular, the rules made under the Act, to confer upon this court the jurisdiction claimed by the applicant.

I think the clue to the matter is that, although the opening words of the subsection are very wide, there is a reference to "proceedings" later in the subsection. The exact words are: the proceedings "may . . . be retained in the court in which the " proceedings were commenced, although it may not be the court " in which the proceedings ought to have been commenced." It is possible, although I think most unlikely, that the legislature was contemplating a case where, although the bankruptcy was proceeding in a particular county court, someone might make an application either in the High Court or in another county court in those bankruptcy proceedings. Of course, he would in fact be in grave practical difficulties in getting any other court to issue any summons; but I think it was most unlikely that the legislature had that state of affairs in mind. Indeed, if it had, it is plain that, if the motion were started in this court, it could be heard here, although wrongly issued. That has not been suggested. I think that the proceedings which the legislature had in mind in the concluding part of subsection (2) were the proceedings which initiated the bankruptcy. It sometimes happens that bankruptcy proceedings may be initiated in the wrong court, the commonest cause being that the petitioning creditor has mistaken the proper address of the debtor and therefore starts the proceedings in the wrong court. This subsection provides that the court may, notwithstanding, have jurisdiction to entertain the bankruptcy proceedings.

[2] [1917] 2 K.B. 729. [3] Ibid. 732.

If that be the true meaning to be placed upon the word " pro- " ceedings " towards the end of subsection (2), I think that it is an indication that, although the opening words are very wide, this subsection is concerned with the case of the proceedings in bankruptcy, in the sense of transferring the proceedings initiating the bankruptcy and everything that follows thereon. No one, of course, doubts that the whole bankruptcy proceedings can at any time and at any stage be transferred from court to court, but I do not think that this subsection is concerned at all with the case of a transfer of a particular application or motion in any particular bankruptcy. It is only referring to the transfer of the whole bankruptcy proceedings. Power to transfer part only of the bankruptcy proceedings would also, in my judgment, be productive of great administrative inconvenience.

Accordingly, there is, in my judgment, no jurisdiction in this court to accede to this application.

I propose, therefore, only to say very few words about the merits. The principal ground upon which the application was based was that the matter involved the attendance for cross-examination of some six professional men, all of whom are in London. I should not myself regard that as a sufficient reason. It has, in addition, been said that the matter is of great complication which might last two or three days. That is perhaps a slightly more convincing ground, but I must not be taken, in case this case should go further, as indicating that I am altogether satisfied that, had I jurisdiction, I would make the transfer of this particular motion. It is a matter which, so far as I am concerned, remains open.

* POLSKIE TOWARZYSTWO HANDLU ZAGRANICZNEGO DLA ELEKTROTECHNIKI "ELEKTRIM" SPOLKA Z OGRANICZONA ODPOWIADZIOLNOSCIA v. ELECTRIC FURNACE CO. LTD.

Practice and Procedure—Trial—Mode of trial—Damages for breach of contract — Direction on plaintiff's application that liability be determined by judge and quantum of damages subsequently by official referee — Discovery as to damages to be deferred until liability established — No sufficient demarcation of the issues as pleaded — Separation impracticable and inconvenient — R.S.C., Ord. 36, r. 7.

In an action by the plaintiff company alleging that the defendant company had committed breaches of certain contracts for the supply to them of plant, the judge directed that the issue as to liability should be determined first at the trial of the action and that all questions as to the quantum of damages, if the defendants were found to be liable, should be referred subsequently to the official referee. The judge further directed that discovery in relation to the quantum of damages should be deferred until after the issue of liability had been established:—

Held, that having regard to the pleadings the line of demarcation between questions of quantum and questions of liability was not, and possibly could not be, sufficiently defined to make the division practicable, and that the order should be discharged.

Per curiam. Without laying down any general rule which might fetter judicial discretion the kind of case in which an order of this kind could usefully be made was one in which the matter directed to be tried first would, when decided one way or the other, be likely to dispose of the case. An order of this type should not be made unless there was on the pleadings a clear line of demarcation between the issues which it was sought to decide separately.

Decision of Devlin J. reversed.

APPEAL from Devlin J.

The following statement of facts is taken substantially from the judgment of Jenkins L.J.

The plaintiffs, Polskie Towarzystwo Handlu Zagranicznego Dla Elektrotechniki "Elektrim" Spolka Z Ograniczona Odpowiadziolnoscia (hereafter called "the Polish company"), brought an action against the defendants, the Electric Furnace Co. Ltd. (hereafter called "the British company"), claiming damages for breach of certain contracts for the supply by the British company to the Polish company of certain plant.

By the statement of claim dated April 29, 1952, the Polish company stated that they were "a corporation maintained by the "Polish Republic for the purpose (inter alia) of purchasing "industrial plant to be used in the production of steel by the "Central Steel Board . . . of the said republic (hereinafter "called 'the board')." In paragraph 2 the Polish company pleaded a contract for the supply of a furnace of 300 kilograms cast steel capacity, which they referred to as the first installation, for the price of £10,650, the date for delivery to the Polish company being in August, 1950. Paragraph 3 alleged that "The "defendants [the British company], at the time when the first "contract was made, well knew that the plaintiffs [the Polish "company] required the first installation for the purpose of its "transfer to and use by the board in the production of cast "steel and that when the said installation was in operation the "annual production of steel therefrom would be about 600 tons." In paragraph 4 there was an allegation of an advance payment of 20 per cent. of the price by the Polish company to the British company in October, 1948. In paragraph 5 further payments on account were alleged. In paragraph 6 the Polish company pleaded a further order for furnaces at the total price of £11,550 for delivery, again, in August, 1950. An allegation was made as regards that contract in paragraph 7 in the same terms, mutatis mutandis, as the allegation in paragraph 3, that is to say that, to the knowledge of the British company, the plant was being acquired for use by the board, and that when the installation was in operation the annual production of steel therefrom would be about 450 tons. In paragraph 8 there was an allegation of a payment in advance in respect of the second contract, and in paragraph 9 of certain payments on account. Further payments were mentioned in paragraph 10.

The Polish company went on to allege that the British company repudiated the contract at a conversation which took place on December 6, 1950, and in paragraph 12 that the Polish company, by letters from their solicitors, elected to treat the contracts as discharged by reason of such repudiation.

Paragraph 13 contained a general allegation of damages, and propounded alternative methods of calculating the damages. The first basis propounded adopted as the measure the Polish company's loss of production on the footing that they could not get any substitute installations. It was put that the Polish company had lost the production for an indefinite period, being the production which they would otherwise have obtained from such installations; and they put the production at about 1,050 tons per annum. Then they valued the production at about £48,000, and took 17 per cent. of such value, making £8,287, as a reasonable estimate of the annual damage suffered by the Polish company. Alternatively, a calculation was made on the assumption that it was possible for the Polish company to get similar installations elsewhere; and on that basis the damage was laid at a sum representing the additional cost of comparable plant, together with the loss of production which would have ensued owing to the unavoidable delay in getting such alternative installations. In paragraph 14 the Polish company pleaded, alternatively, that the board had suffered the said loss and damage, and that the Polish company would have to make it good to the board. Paragraph 15 alleged: "Further, the said "shipments of part of the first and second installations, without "the completion of the said installations, are valueless and could "not be used for the purpose of any alternative installation."

Additional paragraphs were introduced by amendment in December, 1953, and arose out of the apparent necessity for a licence from the authorities in this country covering any export to Poland of installations of this kind. It was alleged by the Polish company, in effect, that any difficulties arising on the question of a licence could not be relied upon by the British company, because those difficulties were of their own making. These pleas were apparently included in the statement of claim by way of anticipation of reliance by the British company on the licence position.

The defence, in essence, was a denial of repudiation by the British company, and an allegation that, on the other hand, the Polish company had repudiated. The British company also said that before the Polish company had accepted any repudiation by the British company the further performance of the contracts became impossible because further export of goods of this kind to Poland was prohibited.

On January 10, 1956, the Polish company took out a summons for further directions in the action asking: "1. That only the "questions of the above-named defendants'" [the British company's] "liability for the repayment of the several sums in the "amended statement of claim herein mentioned and the "damages therein claimed be determined at the trial of this "action and that all questions of the amount of such damages, "if any, shall after such determination be referred to the "official referee in rotation or as the trial judge may order. "2. That until after the determination of such questions of "liability or further order, discovery in relation to the quantum "of the said damages shall be deferred. . . ." Master Clayton, on February 8, 1956, refused to make the order asked for, but, on appeal, Devlin J. made the order in the terms asked. The British company appealed.

Maurice L. Lyell Q.C. and R. J. Parker for the British company.

D. N. Pritt Q.C. and L. J. Solley for the Polish company.

In addition to the cases referred to in the judgments the following were cited in argument: Liverpool, Brazil, and River Plate Steam Navigation Co. v. *London and St. Katherine Steam Navigation Co.; Monk v. Redwing Aircraft Co. Ltd.†; Parker v. Wells ‡; Fennessy v. Clark.§

JENKINS L.J., having stated the facts, said: It would be apparent to anyone that the calculation of damages in the event of the Polish company making good their case as to the contracts and the British company's repudiation of them would be a matter of considerable complication and difficulty; but Mr. Lyell, for the British company, says that, difficult as the calculation of the quantum of damages may be, there is no justification in this case for the order made by the judge.

The jurisdiction to make the order is contained in Ord. 36, r. 7, which provides: "Subject to the provisions of the preceding "Rules of this Order, the court or a judge may, in any cause or "matter, at any time or from time to time, order that different "questions of fact arising therein be tried by different modes of "trial, or that one or more questions of fact be tried before the "others, and may appoint the places for such trials, and in all "cases may order that one or more issues of fact be tried before "any other or others." There is no doubt, therefore, as to the jurisdiction of the court to make such an order; and it is clear, also, that the question whether such an order should or should not be made in any given case is a matter for the discretion of the judge. Mr. Lyell, however, contends that, discretionary as this order was, it ought not to be allowed to stand on account of the serious embarrassment to the British company which would ensue. He said, I think rightly, that the making of an order of this sort at the instance of a plaintiff was a rare occurrence. He did not dispute that it could be done, but he said that it was a kind of order which should only be made in exceptional circumstances.

He referred us to a number of authorities. I do not propose to take up time by reading all of them. The first was Emma Silver Mining Co. v. Grant.[1] In that case Sir George Jessel M.R. said[2]: "I do not intend to lay down any general rule for "the proper construction of Ord. 36, r. 6"—that is the present Ord. 36, r. 7, which is in substantially the same terms—"because, first of all, I think one judge has no right to embarrass "other judges by laying down general rules of construction; and, "in the second place, I think it is very undesirable to limit the "operation of a rule expressed in general terms by stating the "circumstances, or all the circumstances under which the judge "thinks the discretion ought to be exercised. The discretion is "general. Of course it is a judicial discretion, and there must "be sufficient reason for exercising it; but what I intend to do "is to state one or two cases in which I have been asked to put "the rule in force, and what I have done, and why; and then I "shall state why I think I ought to put the rule in force in the "present instance." Sir George Jessel M.R. went on to give a number of examples in which he had allowed a preliminary point to be dealt with separately, or some particular point in the case to be dealt with separately, before the rest of the case, these being all instances where he was satisfied that there was a real probability that the direction that that particular issue should be heard would one way or the other dispose of the action.

In that particular case, which had arisen out of an action in respect of frauds in relation to the promotion of a company, Sir George Jessel M.R., at the instance of the plaintiffs, directed, as I understand it, that the issue whether two particular persons concerned in the affairs of the company were promoters of the company should be tried first; but that direction was only made upon terms that the plaintiffs should give up any other cause of action against those two defendants which was not covered by the issue directed to be tried and also undertake to consent to the discontinuance of such portion of the action as and when the court should direct. So that was a very different case; but it is useful as showing, first, that no general rule ought to be laid down to define the circumstances in which orders of this sort ought to be made and, secondly, that, without attempting to lay down any general rule, the kind of case in which an order of that sort can usefully be made is a case in which the matter directed to be tried first will, when decided one way or the other, really be likely to dispose of the case.

I only intend to refer to one other of the authorities under Ord. 36, r. 7. That is Smith & Co. v. Hargrove & Co.,[3] and the headnote, I think, gives a fair example of one kind of case where an order such as the order made here is appropriate. The headnote says: "Where liability and also the amount of damages are "disputed in an action, and the question as to the amount of "damages is one of such detail or nature that it probably will "be referred to some other tribunal than a jury, it is a proper "exercise of discretion under Ord. 36, r. 8, to order the question "of liability to be tried, and the question of damages to be "postponed until afterwards." There seems to have been a renumbering of the rules, because I see it is said in argument[4] that Piercy v. Young[5] was decided on the former Ord. 36, r. 6, "which is almost identical with the present r. 8 of Ord. 36, "under which the master's order was made." So that what was r. 6 appears to have become r. 8 and now to be r. 7.

That being an example of the type of case that can suitably be dealt with in the way in which the judge thought this case could be dealt with, I add that, generally speaking, an order such as this ought not to be made unless there is on the pleadings a clear line of demarcation between issues bearing on liability and issues bearing on quantum of damages. It is on that aspect of this matter that I feel difficulty. To put it at its shortest, the action is one in which the Polish company claims against the British company damages for breach of contract. The contract is alleged, repudiation is alleged and the Polish company's election to treat the contract as discharged by repudiation is alleged. It may be said that nearly all the other issues go to quantum of damages. Once the breach of contract is established liability is established for the damages, whatever they may be, which have flowed from the breach, and the remaining issues may all, in a sense, be said to be directed to the question of quantum.

[3] (1885) 16 Q.B.D. 183.
[5] (1880) 15 Ch.D. 475.

Looking at the statement of claim here from that point of view one finds first an allegation in paragraph 1 that the Polish company are a corporation maintained by the Polish Republic for the purpose of purchasing industrial plant to be used by the Central Steel Board. That might or might not be said to be an allegation directed to liability; but it might well be said to affect the quantum of damages, inasmuch as if the Polish company purchased plant that was not for their own use, they might make no loss if the plant was not supplied. Then one has the allegations in paragraphs 3 and 7, which allege certain knowledge on the part of the British company, namely, that the Polish company required these installations for transfer to and use by the board and that the annual production of steel therefrom was to be about 600 tons in one case and 450 tons in the other case. Both those two paragraphs may, I suppose, be said to go to quantum of damages. The point of alleging that the British company knew these matters would be, I take it, to seek to hold them liable for loss based on an output of 600 tons or 450 tons, as the case may be, on the principle of Hadley v. Baxendale.[6] Then paragraph 13 propounds the alternative methods of measuring damage, that is, either by production or by the increase of cost incurred in purchasing comparable plant; and paragraph 14 alleges that "alternatively the board has suffered the said loss and damage "and the plaintiffs will have to make the same good to the "board." That, again, in a sense, might be said to go to liability, for it embraces the question whether the British company are liable to the Polish company for damage suffered by the board. It raises also the question whether the Polish company themselves are under any liability to the board. Nevertheless, it could also be said to go to the quantum of damage. If the Polish company were under no liability to the board then the damage the Polish company would have suffered under this head would perhaps be 40s. only, whereas if they were liable to the board, or at all events if they were, to the knowledge of the British company, under a liability to the board, the quantum of damages would, I suppose, be such as to include the damage suffered by the board which the Polish company had to make good. Then there is an allegation in paragraph 15 that the shipments made of parts of the first and second installations, without completion of them, were valueless. That, I suppose, might be said to go to quantum of damage inasmuch as it is saying that no sum should be set off against the Polish company's loss on the strength of the value of the partial deliveries.

There are thus in this pleading, as it seems to me, several allegations which are on debatable grounds as regards distinguishing between liability and quantum of damage. These same allegations, or some of them, seem to me to raise issues of fact which would more suitably and conveniently be tried by the judge at the trial in the ordinary way than made the subject of a reference. That, in my view, applies to paragraph 3 and paragraph 7 of the statement of claim, those being the paragraphs which allege that the British company knew about the proposed transfer to and use by the board of the installations and as to the tonnage of the output of steel therefrom. It seems to me that those issues would be more suitably dealt with at the trial in the ordinary way. It seems to me also that the allegations as to the relationship between the Polish company and the board made in paragraphs 1 and 14 of the statement of claim are likewise matters more suitable to be dealt with by the judge than by an official referee. These matters seem to me to be likely to raise questions possibly of some difficulty and complication as to the relationship under Polish law of the Polish company and the board.

Arising out of the various allegations to which I have referred there is a question which at some time will have to be dealt with by somebody, and that is the question raised in paragraph 13 as to the proper principle to be applied in assessing the damages. That, I suppose, would turn, inter alia, on whether the Polish company were held to have established paragraphs 3 and 7 of the statement of claim. I think a question of general principle such as that is more suitable for the judge at the trial to determine than for a reference to an official referee.

I would further observe, as regards the questions of fact which I have noticed and characterized as being in a debatable area, that where there is an intricate question of fact and it is decided at the trial in the ordinary way then the dissatisfied party has the right of appeal to this court; but, as I understand the position, the decision of an official referee on questions of fact is final; there is no appeal from him to this court except on a question of law. So far as these paragraphs involve questions of law, it seems to me, again, that it would be better dealt with by the judge at the trial. The residuum, which would more conveniently and quickly be dealt with by an official referee, consists, to my mind, of the calculations and investigations into figures and matters of detail, which would have to be performed on a considerable scale in order to work out the correct figure of damages after all the facts have been ascertained and the principles to be applied have been laid down.

For the reasons which I have endeavoured to state (and I state them with diffidence, as I am differing from the view taken by Devlin J. in the exercise of his discretion) I do not think that this is a case in which the questions of liability and questions of quantum ought at this stage to be separated for the purposes of trial. It seems to me that the line of demarcation between these two types of issue is not sufficiently defined in the pleadings, and it may not at this stage be possible sufficiently to define it to make it practicable for a division to be effected. It would be highly inconvenient if the parties went before the court for the trial of the issue of liability and there ensued a difference, perhaps an irreconcilable difference, in their respective views as to where the judge's jurisdiction was to end for the purposes of that particular hearing. For these reasons, as I have said, I do not consider that the direction given in paragraph 1 of the order ought to have been made; and, in my judgment, the order of Master Clayton on that part of the application should be restored.

Mr. Lyell also objected to the limitation on discovery imposed by the second paragraph of the order, and he did so mainly on the novel and interesting ground that, if discovery bearing on quantum of damage was restricted, he would be unable to avail himself effectively of the privilege of payment into court. That is an argument which on its merits would have appealed more strongly to me if the British company had in the early stages of this action, which began on June 11, 1951, displayed a greater sense of urgency with regard to discovery. However, the point is a new and interesting one on which I find it unnecessary today to express any opinion, for it was, I understood, agreed that, if the first part of the order was discharged, the direction as to the limitation of discovery should go with it. I understand that to have been said on the ground that a departure from the general order for discovery originally made could only be justified as a direction ancillary to another order under Ord. 54, r. 9. Be that as it may, the parties were agreed that the provision for discovery should go with the other part of the order if it was discharged.

For these reasons I would allow the appeal.

*FRANK W. CLIFFORD LTD. v. GARTH AND ANOTHER.

[1954 F. 1953.]

Building — Licence — "Cost-plus" basis — No licence issued — Work executed in excess of free allowance—Right of contractors to recover up to limit of free allowance.

In 1954 the plaintiff contractors agreed with the defendant owners of premises, which were in a poor state of repair, to execute certain works converting the premises into a coffee bar and restaurant together with whatever work of strengthening and repair might be found necessary as the work progressed, the payment for the work being effected on the "cost-plus" basis.

No building licence was issued; at the time that the work was executed it was lawful, under the provisions of the Control of Building Operations (No. 19) Order, 1953, to execute up to £1,000 of licensable work in 1954 on any one property. On the refusal by the defendant to pay, on the ground that the work, the cost of which exceeded £1,000, was wholly illegal:—

Held, that in a contract of such a nature where the work to be done and the final cost could not be foreseen, there was nothing unlawful until the free limit was exceeded, so that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover any amount properly within that limit.

Semble, that an entire contract to execute for a lump sum of over £1,000 a single and indivisible work without obtaining a licence would have been wholly illegal.

Decision of Harman J. affirmed.

APPEAL from Harman J. (sitting as an additional judge of the Queen's Bench Division).

In 1954 the first defendant, who was the owner of certain premises in Shepherd Market, W., engaged the plaintiffs, a firm of builders, to carry out certain work on the premises, which was done between April 3 and July 11 of that year. During that period the provisions of regulation 56A of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, regarding the control of building operations were in force, but by virtue of article 3 of the Control of Building Operations (No. 19) Order, 1953, it was permissible to execute licensable work on any single property in the year 1954 to the extent of £1,000 without obtaining a licence.

The first intention of the defendant was to construct a coffee bar on the ground floor, but she later decided also to instal a restaurant in the basement. It was found that the premises were in a bad state of repair, and, in the result a substantial amount of strengthening and reconstruction had to be done, which was carried out by the plaintiffs under the supervision of the defendant's architect. It was agreed, as the amount of the work necessary to be done could not be foreseen, that the plaintiffs should do whatever was necessary, being paid on a "cost-plus" basis. In the result, the total value of the work executed, some of which did not require a licence under the regulations, was £1,911 1s. No building licence had been obtained.

The defendant paid a certain sum on account, but disputed the balance. In an action brought to recover the balance of £1,324, the defendant contended that as there was no building licence in force, and as the work done had exceeded the free limit of £1,000, the plaintiffs' claim was void for illegality. Harman J. held that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover in respect of certain items which were non-licensable under the regulations, and in respect of licensable work up to the limit of £1,000; he gave judgment for £1,078, comprising (a) £1,000 in respect of licensable work, less £146 licensable work previously done on the premises by other contractors, and (b) £224 in respect of non-licensable work. The defendant appealed as to the £854 awarded for licensable work, and as to the quantum awarded in respect of one of the non-licensable items.

DENNING L.J. In 1954 the limit of building work that could be done without licence was the sum of £1,000. If a builder, householder or architect did building work in excess of the free limit of £1,000, without a licence, he was guilty of an offence.

We are here concerned with premises Nos. 31 and 33 Shepherd Market in the West End. A Miss Susan Garth had the idea of turning the ground floor into a coffee bar. She met an architect, Mr. Sanderson, who thought it was a good idea, and he acted for her in the work. It was not a work which could be designed and planned beforehand; the amount of work could only be ascertained from time to time as the alterations were made. After the builders, Clifford Ltd., had started the work and got on with the coffee bar, Miss Garth decided it would be a good thing to make a restaurant below; and, when they got below into the basement, it was found out that, in order to make the structure safe and stable, even more work had to be done. All those works would have to be done within the free limit or else within a licence. In addition, there was a large amount of other work to be done, such as laying linoleum and putting in shelves and tables, which would not need a licence at all.

In the upshot the total bill of the builders came to the sum of £1,911 1s. A certain amount was paid on account, but, when the builders sued for the balance, Miss Garth raised the defence of illegality, saying that the free limit was £1,000, and the builders had acted unlawfully in doing the work.

There were two items of work previously carried out on these premises by other contractors—plumbing work and electrical work—together amounting to £146, which used up part of the free limit. The only free amount remaining available for these premises for Messrs. Cliffords was £854. The main question before us is whether that £854 can be recovered. Miss Garth says that, if the builders break the law and exceed the free limit, they cannot recover anything, not even the free amount, because the whole is unlawful.

There have been many cases in these courts where work has been actually licensed. In those cases it has been held that, if work is done in excess of the licence, it is only the excess which is unlawful. The builder can recover payment for the licensed figure, but not for the excess. Further, the builder cannot in a single contract add on the free limit to the licence, so as indirectly to increase the licensed figure. We have now a case, I think for the first time, where there is no licence at all, but only a free limit.

I would be disposed to agree that, if there was an entire contract for a lump sum, say, of £1,500 or £2,000 for a single and indivisible work, and a builder went on with that work without a licence at all, it would all be illegal and the whole would be irrecoverable; but that is not this case. This is a case where the price could not be ascertained beforehand at all; where the work was put in hand without anyone knowing what it would cost. It was a contract for work to be done as required. The price was not stipulated; that could not be fixed. The work was done on a "cost-plus" basis, sometimes called a cost of works basis. In a contract of that kind, when no one knows what the final figure will be, it is, I think, perfectly lawful for the builder to go on with the work, using the full extent of the free limit. It does not become unlawful unless and until he exceeds the free limit. So in this case, right up to the time when the £1,000 was reached the work was perfectly lawful. It only became unlawful in respect of the excess. For the excess, therefore, the builder cannot recover; but for every amount that comes properly within the free limits he can recover. That is what the judge held. I find myself in entire agreement with him.

Mr. Molony, for the defendants, referred us to regulation 56A and, in particular, to paragraph 6 (E),[1] seeking to show that, on the true construction of the regulations, if the free limit is exceeded, the whole is unlawful. I do not agree with that contention. The position when there is a free limit is the same as when there is a licence. It is only the excess that is unlawful.

[His Lordship then dealt with the disputed item, and held that the appeal failed on this point.]

I, therefore, would be in favour of dismissing the appeal.

should not be entitled to receive the income of the trust fund or during such shorter period as the trustee bank should in its absolute discretion think fit the bank should pay all or any part of the said income to or apply the same for the maintenance and personal support or benefit of all or any one or more of the following persons, namely, the husband and his wife, if any, and his children or remoter issue and any persons in whose house or apartments or in whose company or under whose care or control, or by or with whom the husband might from time to time be employed or residing in such proportions and manner as the bank should in its absolute discretion from time to time think proper.

On the hearing of a summons taken out to ascertain whether the discretionary power was valid or void for uncertainty:—

Held, that the provision was void for uncertainty; it was a single unseverable power and owing to the ambiguity of its expression and in particular the use of the word "residing" there could be a number of persons of whom it could not be postulated whether they were or were not within the designated class, and the uncertainty so created avoided the whole provision.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

A settlement dated June 1, 1936, and made between the first defendant (hereinafter called "the husband") of the first part, Lady Rosemary Constance Ferelith Gresham, his wife, of the second part, and Lloyds Bank Ltd. (hereinafter called "the "bank") of the third part, after reciting that previous to their marriage it was agreed that such settlement should be made and that certain investments and property had been transferred to the bank, provided, inter alia, as follows:

By clause 4 the bank was to pay the income of the trust fund (i.e., the said investments and property and such other investments and property as should for the time being represent the same) to the husband during his life or until some act or event should be done or happen whereby the said income or some part thereof if belonging absolutely to him would become vested or charged in favour of some other person.

By clause 6 (i) during the parts (if any) of the life of the husband during which he should not be entitled to receive the income of the trust fund, or during such shorter period (either continuous or discontinuous) as the bank should in its absolute discretion think fit, the bank should pay all or any part of the said income to or apply the same for the maintenance and personal support or benefit of all or any one or more to the exclusion of the others of the following persons, namely the husband and his wife (if any) for the time being and his children and remoter issue for the time being in existence whether minors or adults, and any persons in whose house or apartments or in whose company or under whose care or control or by or with whom the husband might from time to time be employed or residing and the other persons for the time being entitled or interested (whether absolutely, contingently or otherwise) to or in the trust fund under the trusts therein contained to take effect after the death of the husband in such proportions and manner as the bank should in its absolute discretion from time to time think proper.

By clause 6 (ii) subject to the discretionary trust or power contained in clause 6 (i) aforesaid the bank should hold the income or so much thereof as had not been applied under the trust or power aforesaid upon the trusts and for the purposes upon and for which the said income would for the time being be held if the husband were then dead.

By clause 7 (ii) the husband might by will or codicil appoint to or for the benefit of any woman who might become his widow an interest for her life or for any less period in the whole or any part of the trust fund.

By clause 8 after the death of the husband and subject to clause 7 the bank should stand possessed of the capital and future income of the trust fund upon such trusts for the children of the marriage of the husband and Lady Rosemary as were therein declared.

By clause 10, if there should be no child of such marriage, then subject to the trusts powers and provisions thereinbefore declared and contained and to the powers thereby or by law vested in the bank and to every or any exercise of such representative powers, the bank should stand possessed of the trust fund and the income thereof in trust for the husband absolutely.

By clause 11 the husband might after any subsequent marriage by will or codicil revoke the trusts powers and provisions contained in clause 8 and appoint that the trust fund should after his death be held upon such trusts and subject to such powers and provisions and generally in such manner for the benefit of any children or remoter issue of such subsequent marriage in all respects as he should think fit.

Lady Rosemary died on May 19, 1944, and there were no issue of that marriage. In 1948, the husband married his present wife, Diana Gresham, the second defendant, and there were issue of that marriage two children, namely the third and fourth infant defendants, Frank James Gresham and Ann Gresham.

The husband wished, in the events which had happened, to put an end to the settlement. In the circumstances the bank submitted to the court the question whether clause 6 (i) of the settlement was valid, or whether its provisions were void for uncertainty, as that clause remained the only limitation that stood between the husband and the express trust in his favour of both capital and income contained in clause 10.

Accordingly, by this summons, to which the defendants were the husband, his present wife and their two infant children, the bank asked, inter alia: whether the discretionary trust or power set out in clause 6 (i) of the settlement was valid or was void for uncertainty or otherwise.

G. A. Rink Q.C. for the first and second defendants.
John Bradburn for the third and fourth defendants.

Cases cited in argument but not referred to in the judgment: In re Coxen [1]; In re Gape. [2]

HARMAN J. The husband entered into a settlement in June, 1936, in pursuance of articles made prior to his first marriage. It was a marriage settlement, and in a great many respects it is in ordinary form. The wife of that marriage died in 1944, sine prole. The husband remarried in 1948, and has of that second marriage his wife (the second defendant), and two infant children (the third and fourth defendants). He is desirous of putting an end to the settlement if he can. The bank is, in the circumstances, well entitled to come to the court and ask for its directions. The first question which it asks is whether a so-called protective trust (I call it that without prejudice) is valid. The importance of that matter is not that the husband has committed any act of forfeiture, but that it is the only limitation that now stands between him and an express trust in his own favour in the events which have happened, there being neither wife nor issue of his first marriage. There is a power in the settlement to resettle on his second marriage, but only by will. So far as I know, the husband has not attempted to deal in any way with the ultimate remainder by which the fund reverts to him, it having been in origin his fund.

By the settlement the husband assigned certain interests to the bank, all now in possession and of a value of something over £50,000; the income is payable to the husband during his life until the happening of some event of forfeiture such as would prevent him giving a good receipt for the income. This is an ordinary forfeiture clause. The life interest, therefore, runs on until an act of forfeiture happens and then ceases.

The clause on which the doubt arises is intended to fill, or partly to fill, the gap which remains open between the act of forfeiture and the death of the husband when, in the events which have happened, he will become absolutely entitled to the fund subject only to his power to resettle by will on the wife and children of the second marriage. The clause is in these words: "During the parts (if any) of the life of the husband during which "he shall not be entitled to receive the income of the trust "fund"—that is an inaccurate phrase: if he ceases to be entitled during his life to the income of the trust fund he ceases once and for all, and there can only, therefore, be one part of his life during which that will happen—and then it goes on: "or "during such shorter period (either continuous or discontinuous)

[2] [1952] Ch. 743; [1952] 2 T.L.R. 477; sub nom. In re Gape's Will Trusts [1952] 2 All E.R. 579.

" as the bank shall in its absolute discretion think fit the bank " shall pay " the income or apply it in a way to which I will come. The obligation, therefore, although in terms it is imperative, is only for the period of forfeiture or during such shorter period, continuous or not, as the bank think fit, and that (as is conceded) turns what would be a trust into a mere power in the bank which it is not bound to exercise over any period when it does not choose so to do. There is a power, therefore, after a forfeiture has been incurred, to pay or apply income or some part of it as follows. If the power be not exercised, the subsequent limitations would come into force.

The objects of the power of application are stated in a strangely tortuous clause. The application is to be " for the " maintenance and personal support or benefit of all or any one " or more to the exclusion of the others " of the objects (that is to say, I think, that individuals alone and not juridical persons can qualify for benefit), first " the husband "; second, " his " wife (if any) " (that is, the second defendant, at present); third, his " children and remoter issue for the time being in " existence " (that is, at present, the third and fourth defendants).

So far there is no difficulty. Then, I leave out the controversial passage for the moment, the clause goes on: " and the " other persons for the time being entitled or interested . . . to " or in the trust fund under the trusts herein contained to take " effect after the death of the husband." Those other persons have no existence so far as they are not already comprehended in the class of wife, children and remoter issue in the earlier part. So far there is a power to support any wife or any child or remoter issue for the time being in existence. Then, there are added these words, " and any persons in whose house or apartments or " in whose company or under whose care or control or by or with " whom the husband may from time to time be employed or " residing."

What the draftsman was trying to do I do not know—presumably trying to say shortly what needs saying at very much greater length—but if one reads it literally, " any persons in whose " company the husband may be employed " (whatever that may mean) would be eligible; or " under whose care he may be " employed "; or " with whom he may be employed," or, apparently, " by whom he may be residing," whatever that may mean. Mr. Bradburn says, however, that this is not to be construed strictly, but treated as a protective trust intended to benefit the principal beneficiary, namely, the husband, and given a benevolent construction.

I am inclined to accede to that view and to read it like this, " and any persons by or with whom the husband may from " time to time be employed or residing, whether in their house " or apartments, or in their company or under their care and " control." Supposing that it means that, is it possible to say who is an object of this benevolence? It seems to me that the difficulty comes when one gets these words, "in whose "company" he is "residing," or "with whom" he is "residing." What does "residing" mean for this purpose? Is he to reside for a week, or a month, or a year? Is he permanently to reside? It does not say so. If it had said "permanently "reside" I could see that might be much easier.

GRESHAM'S SETTLEMENT, In re. LLOYDS BANK LTD. v. GRESHAM.

Who is it that is envisaged by the instrument as an object of the possible bounty of the bank? I confess that I do not find it possible to say with any certainty. It seems to me, giving the most benevolent meaning to the clause that I can, that there must be a number of persons, or may be a number of persons, of whom it could not be postulated that they were (or were not) within the dragnet of this rather unusually constructed clause. The question is whether that is fatal to the clause. I must hold that it is, because of my decision in In re Gestetner.[1] That was a case of a very large class, but it was conceded that the class, though large, was not one as to the limits of which there was any doubt: one did not know all the people who were in it, but one could postulate of any given person whether he were or were not; and I appear to have said that that made all the difference. I did decide that case on the ground of certainty. I said that it was sufficiently certain if an object could be certainly identified—it being a power, be it said, not accompanied by a duty, a power collateral, as is this power here. But the bank to whom such a power is given does have this to consider—whether it will exercise the power in favour of any postulated person: if the bank is left uncertain whether the person is an object or not, then there does seem to me to be imported that very vice of uncertainty which was urged upon me in In re Gestetner [2] and which in that case I found myself able to reject.

That case has been applied lately by Roxburgh J. in In re Coates.[3] I do not propose to go into the case; it was a question of the testator empowering his wife to nominate certain friends of his as objects of bounty to some limited extent. The judge founded himself on In re Gestetner,[4] and came to the conclusion that he could see plainly enough what the limits of the possible category were, and held that the gift was good. That was a very strong decision. I do not dissent from it in any way but it did depend ultimately on the maxim id certum est quod certum reddi potest: the wife could, by her evidence, supply the court, if necessary, with enough facts to make it clear whether a man ought to rank as a forgotten friend of the testator or no. I do not feel here that the court could get that assistance.

Mr. Bradburn argued, nevertheless, that as this is only one bad category among three or four good ones, one should therefore, if one finds it too vague to enforce, reject the bad category and leave the rest standing, since they consist of perfectly ascertainable persons and, in fact, there are four of them in existence, namely, the four defendants. The whole edifice, he argued, need not be destroyed because it has a bad brick in it. I think that one must destroy it because this is not a series of different powers, but one power to benefit a certain category of people. It does not matter (as In re Gestetner[5] showed) how wide the category be, but its limits must be marked, and if a portion of the category be unmarked one cannot postulate that there is any end to it or any limit to the bank's discretion.

The vice of the phrase which I have read must taint the rest with that degree of uncertainty which obliges the court to say that the whole clause is void and of none effect. I am unwilling to come to such a conclusion, but the clause seems to me to produce so many questions that no adequate meaning can be applied to it.

Declaration accordingly.

A testator devised and bequeathed his residuary real and personal estate to trustees upon trust for sale and conversion. He directed that, upon the death of his widow, his estate should be divided into four shares, certain of which were settled. His personal estate consisted of shares in a private limited company in which his estate held at all times a controlling interest.

In the events which had happened, the plaintiff had become absolutely entitled to 45 per cent. of the income and the capital of the residuary personal estate: certain other beneficiaries, having a settled share therein, would eventually become entitled to 55 per cent.

The plaintiff claimed an order directing the trustees to pay and transfer to him the said 45 per cent. share to which he was entitled; his application was opposed by those interested in the settled share who contended that the trustees should be forbidden to transfer the plaintiff's share of the estate as it was desirable in the interests of the beneficiaries as a whole that the trustees should retain control of the company by keeping in their own hands all the shares:—

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to an order directing the trustees to transfer to him 45 per cent. of the residuary personal estate since those who opposed his claim had not adduced any such special circumstances as to defeat the right of a beneficiary entitled indefeasibly in possession to claim his share of the trust property.

In re Marshall [1914] 1 Ch. 192 and In re Sandeman's Will Trusts [1937] 1 All E.R. 368 followed.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

Joseph Weiner, by his will dated February 28, 1940, devised and bequeathed the residue of his real and personal estate to trustees, namely, his wife, Joan Miriam Isa Elizabeth Weiner (who at the date this summons was taken out had remarried and become Lady Braithwaite) and Reginald Charles Bromhead (hereinafter called "the trustees") upon trust for sale and conversion with power to postpone such sale and with power, inter alia, to invest in the private limited company known as J. Weiner Ltd. (thereinafter and hereinafter called "the "testator's company").

The testator directed his trustees to pay to his said wife during her life in every year either 35 per cent. of the gross income of his trust fund (i.e., the real and personal residuary estate hereinbefore referred to which included 20,000 ordinary shares in the testator's company) for such year or else if this should be the greater the sum of £3,000 so long as 25 per cent. of the shares in the testator's company were retained by the trustees and the sum of £2,000 thereafter, the said sums respectively to constitute if necessary charges upon capital. He then directed that any surplus income after such payment should be divided between four funds (thereinafter and hereinafter defined) and paid as to two-thirteenths to those entitled to the first fund, as to four-thirteenths to those entitled to the second fund, as to two-thirteenths to those entitled to the third fund, and as to five-thirteenths to those entitled to the fourth fund. After the death of his said wife, the testator directed the trustees to divide the trust fund into four parts (the funds hereinbefore referred to) and to hold the first fund of 45 per cent. of the trust fund in trust for Patrick Denis Wyner, his adopted son (hereinafter called "the plaintiff") upon his obtaining 21 years absolutely: to pay the income of the second fund of 20 per cent. of the trust fund to John Weiner, his son (hereinafter called "the third defendant"), and after his death to hold the income and capital thereof for his children upon their obtaining 21 absolutely: to hold the income and capital of the third fund of 10 per cent. of the trust fund upon trust for Millicent Mesloh, Marcelita Weiner and John Weiner, the children of the third defendant (hereinafter called "the fourth, fifth and sixth "defendants") upon their attaining 21 absolutely: to pay the income of the fourth fund of 25 per cent. of the trust fund to certain employees of the testator's company, namely, Charles William James, Victor Thomas Farrant and Francis Spaul Ferris (hereinafter called "the seventh, eighth and ninth defendants") for so long as they should be employed by the testator's company and after the death of all of them or upon failure of the aforesaid trusts, the capital to go over and to accrue to the third fund.

The testator died on July 26, 1941.

By a deed of assignment dated July 25, 1952, the testator's widow assigned all her beneficial interets in the trust fund to the plaintiff to hold the same unto him for his own benefit absolutely.

The said deed accelerated the division of the trust fund and the interests in remainder, and the plaintiff became entitled thereby to 45 per cent. of the capital of the trust fund absolutely. He was entitled by virtue of his interest under the will to 10 per cent. of the income and by virtue of the said deed to 35 per cent. of the income subject only in respect of this 35 per cent. to his rights against the capital of the trust fund hereinbefore recited.

The residuary personal estate consisted at the date of the summons of 125,000 ordinary shares in the testator's company, the increase in the number of shares held by the estate being the result of bonus issues. The estate at this date held 75 per cent. of the issued capital of the testator's company.

The plaintiff took out the present summons to have determined whether or not he was entitled to an order directing the trustees to pay and transfer to him 45 per cent. of the residuary personal estate of the testator.

The trustees did not oppose his claim upon the plaintiff agreeing to release any rights which he might have against the capital of the residuary personal estate by virtue of the said deed of assignment. The seventh, eighth and ninth defendants, also, who were interested only in income of the estate, did not oppose his claim.

The third, fourth, fifth and sixth defendants, who had a settled interest in the estate and would between them eventually become entitled to 55 per cent. of the capital of the residue opposed the claim and contended that the trustee should refuse to make such transfer having regard to the interests of the beneficiaries as a whole.

almost entirely so far as liquid assets go of shares in a private company in which the estate now holds 75 per cent. of the issued capital. The estate has throughout controlled the company, and it could, no doubt, under the law deal with it at will.

The opposition to the plaintiff's claim, as I understand it, is that it is said on behalf of the third, fourth, fifth and sixth defendants, who between them have a settled share in the estate and will eventually become entitled to the other 55 per cent. of these shares, that 55 per cent. plus 45 per cent. of the shares in a private company are not so valuable severally as they are when they are put together; and, therefore, it is right that the trustees should be enjoined and forbidden to distribute these shares in the interests of the beneficiaries as a whole. The plaintiff, of course, is entitled to take his own view about his 45 per cent. interest, but those holding the other 55 per cent., or rather the third defendant, who is life tenant of some portion of that interest, regards it as desirable that the shares should be retained by the trustees and not divided. The question is whether the plaintiff is entitled to be paid out as he claims.

It is necessary first to reach the conclusion that the plaintiff has an indefeasible right to his portion of the estate.

[His Lordship reviewed the facts and came to the conclusion that the plaintiff had an indefeasible right to his portion of the estate subject only to certain potential rights which he might have against capital and which the plaintiff, therefore, agreed to release. His Lordship continued:] The real defence is that, these being shares in a private company, they ought not to be distributed, because it will injure the settled 55 per cent. It will equally injure, I suppose, the unsettled 45 per cent. but Mr. Edwards, on behalf of the former, said that whatever the plaintiff thought about the distribution, those entitled to the settled share would like the whole retained, and had a right to insist that they should be retained. Mr. Edwards relied first on In re Kipping,[1] which decided that, where an estate consisted of realty before 1925 a person was not entitled to have his undivided share handed over to him upon becoming absolutely entitled, because it was notorious that such a course was less advantageous than retaining the whole of the real property. It was not considered there, nor in the earlier case of In re Horsnaill,[2] whether there should be a right to have an appropriation.

However that may be, in the case of In re Marshall[3] it was said, and said quite clearly, in the Court of Appeal that the principle of In re Kipping[4] has no application to personal estate. In re Marshall,[5] I may say, was a case of the dividing of shares in a public company. Lord Cozens-Hardy M.R. said[6]: "Speaking generally, the right of a person, who is entitled

"indefeasibly in possession to an aliquot share of property, to "have that share transferred to him is one which is plainly "established by law." Then he said that that was not true in the case of real estate if the person were to take an undivided share. He continued: "But that doctrine, it seems to me, has "no application, apart from special circumstances, to personal "property."

Lord Cozens-Hardy then made certain observations about limited companies, and showed that the Court of Appeal in In re Marshall [7] did inquire into the circumstances of the company there in question. It was not a private company, and it was suggested to me that the Master of the Rolls at least hinted that it would have been a different matter altogether had the company been a private company, and he did say this [8]: "There "may be cases with reference to the particular position of a "company like this, at a particular time, which may justify the "trustees in exercising their discretion, if they can satisfy the "court that these special circumstances exist; but the case of "the present trustees is not put upon that ground at all."

In re Marshall [9] was essentially different from this case, in that the trustees were there insisting that, as they had a power to postpone sale, they were entitled to exercise that power willy nilly for the beneficiaries, and it was held that they were not. In this case the trustees have taken no such action. They say that they are quite willing to divide and do not seek to exercise their power of postponement in any way. The pressure comes not from the trustees, but from other beneficiaries.

Swinfen Eady L.J. said [10]: "This summons was taken out "by the trustees, and they make no case upon the facts that it "is expedient that they should be allowed to retain the shares "for some longer time, but they rely in their defence upon a "matter of law, their contention being that, having regard to the "true construction of the will, they are entitled to retain the "shares as long as they think fit," and he goes on to say that there has been no attempt to prove special circumstances.

Phillimore L.J. said [11]: "If there is such a right"—that is, to refuse to allow division—"it rests upon the duty of the "trustees to do their best for all the beneficiaries, it being their "consequential duty to keep as large a block of shares as possible "together so as to have large voting power."

Mr. Edwards put his case as high as this, as I think he must, and argued that in the case of any private company where the trustees held a control, no special circumstances need be adduced at all; the mere fact that a controlling interest was held and would not be held if the shares were to be divided was enough to make the court refuse to make the trustees divide. I cannot take that view at all. It would mean, in effect, that there never could be a division, because that must always involve the loss of control. I cannot see that there is anything short of some special circumstances which would justify me in holding up these shares. The trustees have not come forward and said that there are good reasons why they do not wish to divide now, since they may be able to effect some scheme within the next year or so, and they happen to know that the plaintiff is opposed to the scheme. No special circumstances are made here. There are a certain amount of derogatory observations by the third defendant, in America, who says that he does not think very much of the plaintiff's application to business. These remarks seem to me to be entirely an impertinence on the part of the third defendant and to have nothing to do with the matter.

Even if I took a different view, I think that In re Sandeman's Will Trusts [12] would really carry the case the plaintiff's way. In that case there was a private company, and there was a power to retain the shares. The trustees did desire to retain them for the purpose of maintaining control of the company, and Clauson J. held that they had no right to exercise their power to postpone so as to keep the plaintiffs out of their rights. He said [13]: "I can conceive that there might be circumstances—"they would have to be very special—which would justify "the court in refusing to give effect to the plaintiffs' rights; "but I cannot find, on the evidence before me, anything "to suggest that such circumstances exist in this case." A little later he said [14]: "I cannot see that any harm will be done "to anybody by giving effect to the prima facie right of the "plaintiffs to have their shares, and the voting power on their "shares, in their own control."

It is said that there is a difference between the present case and In re Sandeman,[15] because here there is a trust for sale and in In re Sandeman [16] there was not; but, in my view, a person who has 45 per cent. of some shares subject to a trust for sale is entitled to say to a trustee: "Do not sell, hand me my "shares instead," the shares being things of themselves easily divisible and not at all the same as real estate, where there may be no such right.

Consequently, I am of opinion that the plaintiff is justified in calling on the trustees to hand him over his 45 per cent. of this estate, and I propose to direct the trustees to do so.

Order accordingly.

[1955 S. No. 6393 (T).]

Trade Union—Membership—Transfer of—Trades Union Congress principles for avoidance of disputes between affiliated organizations—"Bridlington Agreement"—Breach of agreement by union's admission to membership of person transferring from another union—Purported expulsion of members in compliance with award of T.U.C. disputes committee—Whether implied term of contract of membership of union that member shall conform to and union shall have right to implement lawful agreements of union.

Contract—Implied term — Trade union — Membership of trade union affiliated to Trades Union Congress—Whether term to be implied in contract of membership enabling union to comply with award of T.U.C. disputes committee—Contemplation of parties.

In 1939, at Bridlington, the Trades Union Congress, of which the defendant society and the Transport and General Workers' Union were affiliated organizations, reaffirmed and revised certain principles for the avoidance of disputes between affiliated organizations and adopted certain recommendations, collectively referred to as the "Bridlington Agreement," relating to the transfer of members from one union to another. In breach of the Bridlington Agreement the defendant society in 1955 admitted to membership the plaintiff and other registered dock workers in the port of Liverpool, where the T. & G.W.U. had formerly enjoyed an exclusive monopoly of the membership. The dispute consequently arising between the defendant society and the T. & G.W.U. was submitted to the arbitration of the disputes committee of the T.U.C. in accordance with its rules, and in June, 1955, the committee awarded that the defendant society should exclude from its organization all members recruited by it in certain ports, including Liverpool, since August 17, 1954. In order to implement the award the defendant society instructed its appropriate branch secretaries to inform its members affected by the award, of whom the plaintiff was one, that they were excluded from membership.

In an action by the plaintiff claiming, inter alia, a declaration that the purported expulsion was ultra vires, illegal, unconstitutional and void, the defendant society contended, inter alia, that the expulsion was valid by reason of an alleged implied term of the plaintiff's contract that the defendant society should have a right to comply with its lawful and proper agreements and had determined the plaintiff's membership in pursuance of that right and that there was a further implied term that the plaintiff should conform to the union's lawful and proper agreements:—

Held, granting the declaration, that the award of the disputes committee must be understood as requiring a lawful exclusion from membership which the purported expulsion of the plaintiff was not, for, in the circumstances of the case and since the plaintiff was unaware of the Bridlington Agreement at the time of his admission to membership, the alleged implied terms could not be imported into the plaintiff's contract.

Dictum of MacKinnon L.J. in Shirlaw v. Southern Foundries (1926) Ltd. [1939] 2 K.B. 206, 227; 55 T.L.R. 611; [1939] 2 All E.R. 113 applied.

Held, further, that the Bridlington Agreement was a morally binding code of conduct regulating the relationship between trade unions and imposed obligations on the trade union as an entity and not upon the individual members.

ACTION.

The plaintiff, Francis Spring, a registered dock worker in the port of Liverpool, had since 1940, except for war service and a short period during which he was not working in Liverpool Docks, been a member of the Transport and General Workers' Union (hereinafter referred to as the T. & G.W.U.) which had a membership, excluding its railway members, of over 1¼ million. Until August, 1954, the defendant society, the other union to which stevedores and dockers belong, had a membership of a little under 7,000, confined to London and Rochester. The stevedore and docker members of the T. & G.W.U. were not only in London, where the two unions were in competition, but in all the other ports, and in those the T. & G.W.U. had a monopoly of membership.

Both unions were affiliated to the Trades Union Congress (hereinafter referred to as the T.U.C.) which, in 1924, had laid down certain principles for the avoidance of disputes between affiliated organizations in connexion with the transfer of members from one union to another. Those principles were reaffirmed and revised and certain recommendations were made by the Bridlington Congress of the T.U.C. in 1939, to which both unions were parties, which came to be generally referred to as the Bridlington Agreement. The principles and recommendations (set out in a pamphlet entitled "Relationships between unions," published by the T.U.C. in September, 1952, in which they are referred to as the "Bridlington proposals") provided, inter alia as principles, that a union should not accept a man into membership without inquiry of his present or former union, and that a member should not be allowed to escape his financial obligations by leaving one union while in arrears and joining another; and recommended, inter alia, that a union should not accept a member of another union where inquiry showed that he was in arrears with contributions, and should not start organizing activities at any establishment or undertaking in respect of any grade or grades of workers in which another union had the majority of workers employed and negotiated wages and conditions, unless by arrangement with that union.

On October 27, 1954, the defendant society, in default of its giving an undertaking to cease the organizing activities which had followed on the expression by dockers at Hull and Birkenhead of their dissatisfaction with the T. & G.W.U. and their desire to join the defendant society, was suspended from membership of the T.U.C. until the next annual congress. In November, 1954, by a petition addressed to the defendant society and at a meeting, a large number of Liverpool dockers expressed a desire to join the defendant society. At first, recruiting in Liverpool took place on the basis that a recruit to be acceptable must be clear on the books of the T. & G.W.U. and must have notified that union of his intention to resign. Ultimately, however, resort was had to a rule of the T. & G.W.U. which provided that "any member "... exceeding thirteen weeks in arrears shall be deemed to be "no longer a member ..." and, thereafter, recruiting proceeded on the basis that a member of the T. & G.W.U. to whom the rule applied was no longer a trade unionist. It was upon this basis that the plaintiff was admitted to membership of the defendant society on April 2, 1955, his contributions to the T. & G.W.U. then being more than 13 weeks in arrears.

The dispute consequently arising between the T. & G.W.U. and the defendant society was, in accordance with the rules of the T.U.C., submitted to the arbitration of its disputes committee who upheld the contention of the T. & G.W.U. that the defendant society had accepted members in breach of the Bridlington Agreement, and awarded that the defendant society should exclude from its organization all members recruited by it in Liverpool and certain other ports since August 17, 1954. Thereafter, the acting general secretary of the defendant society on July 6, 1955, sent the following letter to the secretaries of the branches affected by the award: "Implementation of T.U.C. disputes committee "decision: I am to inform you that to comply with the accepted "decision of the T.U.C. disputes committee, you are instructed "... to inform members that from the date of this letter they "are all excluded from membership of the National Amalgamated "Stevedores and Dockers. You are ... not to accept any obliga- "tions or commitments, financial or otherwise, in the name of "the National Amalgamated Stevedores and Dockers as from the "above date." The plaintiff was duly informed of the terms of the letter, but he and others of the Merseyside dockers refused to consider themselves excluded and continued to carry on their trade union activities in the name of the defendant society as they had done before, except that they ceased sending any delegates or money to the London headquarters of the union.

The plaintiff brought this action claiming, inter alia, a declaration that the purported action of the executive committee or council of the defendant society in excluding or causing him to be expelled from membership was ultra vires, illegal, unconstitutional and void; a declaration that notwithstanding the purported exclusion or expulsion, he was and had always been a member of the defendant society since April 2, 1955, and was entitled to the benefits and privileges of such membership; and an injunction restraining the defendant society from preventing him from exercising his privileges and rights as a member of the defendant society. By his statement of claim the plaintiff alleged, inter alia, that the rules of the defendant society (registered on

SPRING v. NATIONAL AMALGAMATED STEVEDORES AND DOCKERS SOCIETY.

February 24, 1928) did not in the circumstances confer upon it any power to expel or exclude him from membership; and that the executive council of the defendant society in unlawfully purporting to exclude him from membership had placed his employment as a port worker in jeopardy.

By its defence the defendant society alleged that the plaintiff, by signing an acceptance form, made certain representations in reliance upon which he was admitted to membership, which representations were not true, whereby the defendant society was under a mistake of fact when the contract of membership was made. It was further alleged that the defendant society, as an affiliated member of the T.U.C., was bound by the Bridlington Agreement; that the award of the disputes committee was correct; and that the continuance of the plaintiff's membership would be a breach of the terms of the award of the disputes committee. The defendant society contended that it was an implied term of the plaintiff's contract of membership that it should have the right to perform and comply with its lawful and proper agreements and had determined the membership of the plaintiff in pursuance of that right; that, further or alternatively, it was an implied term of the plaintiff's contract of membership that he should act in conformity with the lawful and proper agreements of the defendant society and that by reason of the award of the disputes committee he ought to submit to the determination of his membership. The defendant society claimed, by way of counterclaim, a declaration that the plaintiff's contract of membership was void and, alternatively, rescission of the contract.

The plaintiff by his reply and defence to counterclaim joined issue and alleged that the defendant society had been expelled from the T.U.C. and was readmitted on condition that it accepted the award of the disputes committee; that the award did not bind him and the purported expulsion pursuant thereto was contrary to the rules of the defendant society; that the implication that future awards of the disputes committee should be binding on the plaintiff and the defendant society was not within their contemplation and intentions on April 2, 1955; that the purported expulsion constituted a breach of good faith and fair dealing owed to the plaintiff as a member of the defendant society; that the defendant society had enjoyed the benefit of the plaintiff's subscriptions and those of thousands of other recruited dockers in the Liverpool area; and that the attempted act of mass-expulsion was an attempted confiscation of the plaintiff's rights of property and privileges as a member of the defendant society.

The facts more fully appear from the judgment.

cited in argument: Bonsor v. Musicians' Union [1]; Rigby v. Connol [2]; Harington v. Sendall [3]; British Movietonews v. London and District Cinemas [4]; Andrew v. National Union of Public Employees [5]; Williams v. Powell. [6]

SIR LEONARD STONE V.-C. referred to the pleadings, and continued: The important issues raised by the pleadings in this case may affect the lives of many of those who work in the docks and cannot be approached without some knowledge of the history and background against which the dock strikes of 1954 and 1955 took place, and also some knowledge of the inter-relationship of the trade unions with the Trades Union Congress as their ultimate and authoritative link.

The defendant union was founded in 1872 and was registered as a trade union on March 23, 1898. In 1924 at the Trades Union Congress certain principles were laid down with regard to inter-trade union relationship for the purpose of avoiding disputes between trade unions. On February 28, 1928, the current edition of the rules of the defendant union was adopted, there being no mention in them of the principles laid down at the Trades Union Congress of 1924. In 1939 the Trades Union Congress was held at Bridlington, and the principles of 1924 were affirmed and revised, and are generally referred to as the Bridlington Agreement. They are of fundamental importance to every issue I have to determine in this action, and I propose to refer to them at once and in full. They are conveniently set out in a pamphlet issued by the Trades Union Congress called "Relationships "between unions." Under the heading of "Main principles for "the avoidance of disputes, re-affirmed and revised by the Brid-"lington Congress, 1939," are set out four principles:

"1. The application for membership form of the union should "contain an inquiry to be answered by the candidate as to "whether he is or has been a member of any other union, and, "if so, what his financial relationship to that union is.

"2. As a general principle no man who is or has recently "been a member of any trade union should be accepted into "membership in another without inquiry of his present or former "union. The present or former union shall be under obligation "to reply within 14 days of the inquiry, stating:—

"(a) Whether the applicant has tendered his resignation;

"(b) Whether he is clear on the books;

"(c) Whether he is under discipline or penalty;

"(d) Whether there are any other reasons why the applicant "should not be accepted.

"Under no circumstances should a union accept a member

Sir Leonard Stone V.-C.

" who is at the time of his application in dispute with his union " or the subject of disciplinary action or penalty.

" 3. No member should be allowed to escape his financial " obligations by leaving one union while in arrears and by joining " another.

" 4. Under no circumstances should a union accept members " from any other union which is engaged in a trade dispute. It " should be a general understanding that both national and local " officials of trade unions should refrain from speaking or acting " adversely to the interests of any other union during any period " in which the members of the latter union are participating in a " trade dispute. Much trouble could be avoided if unions about " to participate in a trade dispute would take care to inform other " unions whose members would be likely to be affected thereby."

Those principles are followed by some recommendations also adopted at the Bridlington Congress of 1939, which I need not read in full. Suffice it to say that recommendations Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 6 implement main principle No. 2, whereas recommendations Nos. 1 and 5 add something to the main principles, and I will read them: [" Congress recommends that each union shall:—"]

"1. Consider the possibility of joint working agreements with " unions with whom they are in frequent contact; such agree- " ments to deal, where possible, with:—

" (a) Spheres of influence;

" (b) Recognition of cards;

" (c) Machinery of composing difficulties;

" (d) Conditions for transfer of members.

" 5. Not commence organising activities at any establishment " or undertaking in respect of any grade or grades of workers in " which another union has the majority of workers employed and " negotiates wages and conditions, unless by arrangement with " that union."

Then there are set out some regulations governing the procedure in regard to disputes between unions, and, finally, two forms which it is recommended should be used when one trade union is making the inquiry referred to in the principles from another union. The first form headed " Inquiry Form " leaves blank spaces for the insertion of the name of the inquiring union and the name of the union to whom the inquiry is addressed, and continues: " We have received an application:—

" Dated..... from

" Name.....

" Address..... .....

" Employed at.....

" to join our union.

" Before accepting the application we should be glad if you " would, in accordance with the decision of the Trades Union " Congress, let us have your comments on the points raised " overleaf."

The second form, headed " Reply to Inquiry," bears at the top a quotation from main principle No. 2: "The present or "former union (of a member making application to another "union) shall be under obligation to reply within 14 days of the "inquiry," and the form proceeds:

"In regard to the person named overleaf, I desire to reply "as follows:—

"(1) Has the applicant tendered his resignation?

"Answer.....

"(2) Was he clear on the books on the date he made "application?

"Answer.....

"(3) Was he under discipline or penalty on that date?

"Answer.....

"(4) Any other reason why application should not be "accepted?

"Answer....."

That has to be signed by the former union of the applicant.

Printed in the same pamphlet are rules 12 and 13 of the rules and standing orders of the Trades Union Congress. Rule 12 empowers the general council of the Trades Union Congress to use its influence to promote a settlement in the case of any dispute between affiliated organizations and, if necessary, to investigate cases of dispute; and the rule goes on to provide power for the general council to summon contending affiliated organizations to appear before the disputes committee of the general council to submit all evidence and information which the disputes committee may deem essential, and there is a provision as to payment of costs. There follows clause (f): "Should any "affiliated organisation not carry into effect any decision of the "general council in connexion with cases under this rule the "general council may at once issue a report to all affiliated "organisations. If the decision of the general council is still "not carried out, the general council may, at its discretion, adopt "either of the following methods of procedure:

"The general council may report the matter to the next "annual congress to deal with as may be decided upon; or deal "with the organisation under clauses (b), (c) and (d) of rule 13."

Now those clauses become of importance in this case. Clause (b) is as follows: "If after such investigation the general "council decides that the activities of the organisation concerned "are detrimental to the interests of the Trade Union Movement "or contrary to the declared principles of Congress, the general "council shall direct the organisation to discontinue such "activities forthwith and undertake not to engage therein in the "future.

"(c) Should the organisation disobey such direction, or fail "to give such undertaking, the general council is hereby em-"powered in its discretion to order that the organisation be forth-"with suspended from membership of the Congress until the "next annual congress.

Sir Leonard Stone V.-C.

"(d) The general council shall submit a report upon the "matter to the next annual congress."

Mr. Victor Feather, the assistant secretary of the Trades Union Congress and the officer whose duty is the settlement of inter-union and industrial differences before they reach the stage of open dispute, said in his evidence that the principles laid down at Bridlington were not points of law. He described them as being a morally binding code of conduct made between persons of similar views. I understand from his evidence that that is the view of the Trades Union Congress, and it is one which I think it would be difficult to challenge as being otherwise than an accurate definition of the Bridlington principles.

The stevedores and dockers in this country belong to either the defendant union or to the Transport and General Workers' Union. Up to August, 1954, the membership of the defendant union was a little under 7,000, the membership being stevedores and dockers in London and some in Rochester. The Transport and General Workers' Union, on the other hand, had a membership of over a million-and-a-quarter, excluding its railway members, and the stevedore and docker members of the Transport and General Workers' Union were not only in London, where the two unions were in competition, but in all the other ports, and in those the Transport and General Workers' Union had an exclusive monopoly of the membership. The plaintiff, as a checker at Liverpool Docks, had joined the Transport and General Workers' Union in 1940 at the age of 17 and, except for war service in the Royal Navy and a period of about a year in 1953 when he temporarily left his work in Liverpool Docks, he had been a member of the Transport and General Workers' Union until the events immediately relevant to this action occurred.
